she candidly confessed she could not account for more than the rest of us! She was seated in a chair in the middle of a circle of inquiring friends, and kept continually talking or singing, or making some other demonstrations which assured us of her locality (the room was dark) as certainly as though we could see her. Notwithstanding this, a guitar was moving over our heads and behind our backs—sometimes on the carpet, sometimes on the ceiling above, beyond the reach of any person in the room. Some power played upon this guitar beautiful music! I contend that it must have been a power—not only a power, but an intelligent power! What was it? The medium told us that it was a spirit! She said she saw it. She saw other spirits which she described to us individually. We were forced to acknowledge her portraiture to be the exact appearance of some of our departed friends! These friends spoke to us in audible voices. I recognized that of a departed son! He called me father, and asked if I knew him. The medium could not imitate that voice, had she tried. In addition to this, she was singing herself at the time, and this voice seemed to be within a few inches of my face. I was very much moved and shed tears. None in the circle knew this, for it was dark. Notwithstanding, a lady remarked—"one of the spirits is taking my handkerchief from my pocket," and almost instantly a hand was laid upon my forehead, and another holding a handkerchief wiped the tears from my face. Different voices were speaking around the room at the same time, proving it to be impossible for it to be the work of the medium. But I have said enough, though not all. For this, the medium asked nothing, though she had come thirty miles at my request, and at first positively refused a present I offered her. I have since witnessed similar extraordinary things at her own house without giving anything. I mention this because your correspondent asks if he must "send five dollars to J. V. Mansfield." He must not expect, however, that mediums can make a business of going through the world "to convince the poor of the earth without money and without price." If your correspondent wishes to investigate this, I will give him the name and residence of the medium I speak of, and I have no doubt he can witness as strange things as these. Theologians will account for these phenomena by ascribing them to the devil. I cannot disprove the objection here. Scientific men, in their insane pride, will absolutely deny the facts or ascribe them to delusion. All I can answer to this is, if I have not witnessed and heard what I have above written, then my whole existence, the seeming existence of the whole universe may be, nay, probably is, a psychological delusion!

EDWARD M. MACGRAW.

THE BONDAGE OF FEAR.

[By T. M. Coan, in the Galaxy for August.]

Nor is our timidity a matter of the affections or of the outward life alone. Our intellects themselves toil in the same bondage of fear.

No people is so absolutely, I may say so abjectly, under the sway of public sentiment as ourselves; and many of our opinions experience severer restrictions as to expression than the Frenchman's insurrectionary politics find in the press laws of Napoleonic administration. We have, indeed, free speech in politics; but there are things which are quite as important to us as our privilege to vote. Upon the questions of religion and moral science there is less real freedom of debate among us than in almost any European country. Fearless discussions on these subjects rarely find their way into our abler public prints, and the active thinkers are left to battle in the dark with the phantoms of the darkness. In one of her letters Miss Martineau, than whom a more thoughtful critic has seldom written of us, says: "I never found so much concealed infidelity in my life as was confessed to me in America." There is an evident reason for the fact. Public opinion denies to the finest natures among us the privilege of a dispassionate hearing, of an audience for their aspirations, their questionings, their doubts that wander through eternity. The highest criticism is silenced among us, not wholly to the advantage of growth in character. The outlying dominions of thought should be explored by banded companies, and in the daylight; but we elect to grope alone and by night in the terra incognita, and our best minds shrink from entering the region of intellectual outlawry.

HOW TO TRAIN A CHILD.—SOME GOOD ADVICE TO PARENTS.—A little tract, issued for distribution by the Ladies' Sanitary Association of London, gives these wise suggestions for the nurture of children in health of body and spirits:—

1. Never refuse a thing if it is harmless, but give it, if you are able, without delay.
2. Never give anything because it is cried for, that you have refused when asked for.
3. Be careful to observe real illness, and avoid causing bodily uneasiness from overclothing, or cold or unwholesome food, such as candy-plums, sour fruit, or giving buns or cakes to quiet the child.
4. Avoid false promises. They are sure to be found out false.
5. Avoid threats of all kinds. If believed, they make children timid, and injure both mind and body; if not believed, they are useless.

A CONDUCTOR of a Yankee newspaper, eulogizing a contemporary, says: "He was formerly a member of Congress, but rapidly rose till he obtained a respectable position as an editor; a noble example of perseverance under depressing circumstances."

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

NOW READY!

The Report of the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston last May, has been printed in pamphlet form. This Report contains addresses by O. B. Frothingham, D. A. Wasson, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, F. E. Abbot, Samuel Johnson, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, Thos. W. Higginson, Wm. Henry Channing and others. The price of the pamphlet is fifty cents; in packages of five or more, thirty cents each. It can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.; also in Boston at Crosby & Damrell's, 100 Washington street, and at the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield street; in Cincinnati of Bloch & Co., 150 West Fourth street, and in Toledo at the office of THE INDEX.

The address of Mr. Channing on the Religions of China, which is a word specially adapted to the times, has also been printed separately, and can be obtained as above for twenty cents a copy.

CONVENTIONS.

It will be remembered that at the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association a resolution was passed, recommending the Executive Committee to arrange for four Conventions, before the next annual meeting, in different parts of the country. This resolution has been referred to a sub-committee, who are already at work upon the matter. It is altogether probable that a Convention of the Association will be held in Cincinnati some time in October. And it is thought desirable that the Cincinnati Convention should be directly followed by another at some other point in the West. With reference to the place for this second convention the Committee have had correspondence with various friends of free religious thought in the West, and several places appear to offer a good opportunity. At a meeting of the "Independent Congregational Society," in Salem, Ohio, the following resolution has been unanimously adopted, and sent to Mr. Abbot, one of the Committee:—

"Resolved, That this Society extend to F. E. Abbot, of Toledo, and to liberal-minded people everywhere, an invitation to hold a Free Thought Convention in Salem, Ohio, at some time in the Fall of 1870, to be hereafter agreed upon."

Respectfully and truly yours,

J. S. CLEMMER, Cor. Sec.

Equally cordial responses have come from friends in Indianapolis and Richmond, Ind.;

from Dayton, O., and from Syracuse, N. Y.; so that it is probable the Association will hold two conventions, perhaps three, in the West this autumn.

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ AND REFORM.

Some question has been raised whether the Bramo Somaj in India is really devoted to social and moral reform. On this question we are glad to be able to put on record the following testimony. The first extract is from a tract entitled "An Appeal to Young India," of which the author is content to sign himself simply "A Missionary of the Brahmo Somaj." After speaking of the spirit that should distinguish reformers, he continues:—

Let us now consider the chief evils in Hindu society against which reformers should direct their special exertions with a view to lay the foundation of a thorough social and moral reformation.

There can be no doubt that the root of all the evils which afflict Hindu society, that which constitutes the chief cause of its degradation, is Idolatry. Idolatry is the curse of Hindustan, the deadly canker that has eaten into the vitals of native society. It would be an insult to your superior education to say that you have faith in idolatry, that you still cherish in your hearts reverence for the gods and goddesses of the Hindu Pantheon, or that you believe in the thousand and one absurdities of your ancestral creed. But however repugnant to your understanding and repulsive to your good sense the idolatry of your forefathers may be, there is not a thorough appreciation of its deadly character on moral grounds. It will not do to retain in the mind a speculative and passive disbelief in its dogmas; you must practically break with it as a dangerous sin and an abomination; you must give it up altogether as an unclean thing. You must discountenance it, discourage it, oppose it, and hunt it out of the country.

Next to Idolatry, and vitally connected with its huge system, is Caste. You should deal with it as manfully and unsparringly as with idolatry. That Hindu Castism is a frightful social scourge, no one can deny. It has completely and hopelessly wrecked social unity, harmony, and happiness, and for centuries it has opposed all social progress. But few seem to think that it is not so much as a social, but as a religious institution, that it has become the great scourge it really is. As a system of absurd social distinctions, it is certainly pernicious. But when we view it on moral grounds, it appears as a scandal to conscience and an insult to humanity, and all our moral ideas and sentiments rise to execrate it and to demand its immediate extermination. Caste is the bulwark of Hindu idolatry and the safeguard of Brahminical priesthood. It is an audacious and sacrilegious violation of God's law of human brotherhood. It makes civil distinctions inviolable divine institutions, and in the name of the Holy God sows perpetual discord and enmity among His children. It exalts one section of the people above the rest, gives the former, under the seal of divine sanction, the monopoly of education, religion, and all the advantages of social pre-eminence, and vests them with the arbitrary authority of exercising a tyrannical sway over unfortunate and helpless millions of human souls, trampling them under their feet and holding them in a state of miserable servitude. It sets up the Brahminical order as the very viceregerents of the Deity, and stamps the mass of the population as a degraded and unclean race, unworthy of manhood and unfit for heaven. Who can tolerate this woeful despotism, this system of abhorrent slavery, this robbery of divine authority? Fellow-countrymen, if you abjure idolatry and rally under the heavenly standard of the true God, you must establish and organize a new brotherhood on the basis of enlightened thoughts and sentiments: in this reformed alliance you must discard and discountenance all caste distinctions, in order that truth may be freely embraced by all, Brahmin and Sudra alike, and that both, by virtue of birthright, may secure access to the blessings of spiritual freedom, progress, and happiness, without let or hindrance. Abolish Idolatry and seek the worship of the true God; kill the monster Caste, and form a rational and religious brotherhood of all your reformed countrymen.

Thirdly, our Marriage Customs involve evils of great magnitude which urgently call for reform. They are not only repugnant to morality and reason, but constitute one of the powerful causes of the physical degeneracy of our nation. Horrid Polygamy leads this mighty train of evils. Supported by Kulinism, it gives certain persons privilege to marry several scores of wives and to make holy matrimony a dishonorable traffic for money's sake. It joins in wedlock a man eighty years old with a girl hardly nine; it forces many of the fair sex to perpetual celibacy or to virtual widowhood, and tempts many to a life of infamy, rendering the hymeneal altar a curse instead of blessing. Premature marriages are not less mischievous. Experience has shown how they sap the foundation of the nation's health, and interfere with the noble purposes of conjugal union. The forcible prohibition of the re-marriage of widows (though the widowhood may begin in childhood) is simply an act of atrocious inhumanity, which is the more painful on account of the excruciating tortures and penances which Hindu widows are religiously forced to undergo under the penalty of the forfeiture of heaven. Not to speak of conscience, the very feelings of the nation ought to stand up to protest against this cruel custom. The countless restrictions which control marriage union and confine it not only within the membership of the same caste, but even within its minute and contracted divisions and subdivisions, not only tend to keep up the system of caste, which is itself a great evil, but prevent the growth of the nation. They ought to be gradually set aside, and the fullest scope should be given to the important alliances upon which domestic happiness rests by promoting inter-marriages between members of the different castes and the different races of India.

Fourthly, the Zenana [woman's home sphere] requires thorough reform. On this point it is unnecessary to dilate, as you daily witness the miserable condition of your wives and sisters, your mothers and daughters; you daily feel the wretchedness of your homes. And certainly nothing can be clearer to you than this, that so long as our females continue in their present degraded state, menials of the household, slaves of ignorance and superstition, and withal cypresses in society, the reformation of our country will be partial and superficial. Women's minds are powerful,—powerful for propagating good as well as evil. Do what you will to promote reformation, so long as errors and prejudices lodge in their minds, they will be perpetuated from generation to generation. While blessed with knowledge and refinement, our females will establish and extend the kingdom of truth with more than missionary zeal; and educated and dutiful mothers will achieve greater success in civilizing the country than all its schools and colleges. But apart from considerations of expediency, charity and justice imperatively demand that you should share with your wives and sisters the blessings of education. Remember that you have no right to treat them as outcasts of society, and deny them the precious advantages which you enjoy, and to which, as God's children and possessed of immortal souls, they, too, are fully entitled. Do full justice to their souls and rescue them from the thralldom of ignorance and superstition and their attendant evils. Illumine their minds with the light of sound and liberal education; admit them into rational intercourse with enlightened and virtuous companions; above all, let them join you in your daily worship of the true God. Thus our countrymen and women will walk hand in hand in the path of intellectual and moral advancement, and thus, as our social customs improve, enlightened and happy homes will be established as the sure basis of national prosperity and greatness.

Another Tract from India, containing a lecture by Keshub Chunder Sen, delivered in 1868, urges the same reforms and argues the necessity of basing them on religious reformation, or on the enthusiasm of a true faith. He says:—

You will ask me, what is my programme of social reform? I would say, all the social reforms I would propose for your consideration are involved in this grand radical reformation—religious reformation. You will not be required to convene public meetings for the purpose of carrying out this reform or that. No! For then, through faith, the sense of duty of each individual will have been awakened to this work,—to the urgency and momentousness of attending practically to the social interests of India. Questions of social reform will not then appear to you as matters of worldly expediency, but as questions of vital moral importance, and will come upon you with all the weight of moral obligation. To believe in the fatherhood of God is to believe in the brotherhood of man; and whoever, therefore, in his own heart and in his own house worships the true God daily must learn to recognize all his fellow-countrymen as brethren. Caste would vanish in such a state of society. In such an enthusiastic religious state of fellowship caste would die of itself. If I believe that my God is one, and that He has created us all, I must at the same time instinctively, and with all the warmth of natural feelings, look upon all around me, whether Parsees, Hindus, Mohammedans, or Europeans, as my brethren. Where, then, are distinctions? Where are those questions about dinners and intermarriages, which we so often meet, and which seem to puzzle many? All these problems will then be solved most readily, most easily. If you ask me to dine with you, if you ask me to get my daughter married to a man of another caste, I will not go to ask philosophy or logic, I will not try to convene social debating clubs, I will not go to my schoolmaster to ask what I ought to do; my sense of duty will be all in all to me. It will guide me, and compel me to action,—saying: If you wish to be true to that God whom you have recognized as your Father, be true to all around you who are your brethren. . . . Be true to God, and then, when you embark on the enterprise of Indian social reformation, you will not shrink back from its difficulties. With God's aid that work shall be done, which was difficult—impossible—without God's aid. Female education, widow marriage, abolition of caste, all these questions will then be simple questions of duty—of benevolence and justice. Have I any right to deny any of my fellow-countrymen or country women those rights, privileges, advantages, and pleasures, which as men and women, as God's children, they are entitled to? Benevolence will solve the difficulty. . . . Whether it be education, or social reformation, or simply the improvement of roads—whether it be material, or intellectual reformation—all these, I say, will spontaneously and naturally flow from religious reformation.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

FI

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,

Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,

Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, April 23d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience; of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,

Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,

Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y. Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 23d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,

Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,

Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

AN ORATION,

Delivered at White's Hall, Toledo, at the

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE BIRTH

ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT,

SEPTEMBER 14, 1869.

In the misty ages which preceded the dawn of authentic history, the great benefactors of mankind were exalted by the idealizing imagination of succeeding times to the rank of superior beings, and worshipped with divine honors. From grander heights of majesty and power, they were conceived as still continuing their beneficent activity, and still influencing for good the fortunes of the race. Elevated forever beyond the reach of evil, and surrounded with eternal sunshine, they inhabited the lofty summits of Olympus, sipped nectar from the cup of graceful Hebe, and tasted the finer nectar of converse with celestial minds. Such, in the simple conception of early ages, was the reward of eminent merit,—such the wages of conspicuous service, awarded by the acclamation of mankind. "What nature among men is more noble," says Cicero, "than that of those who believe themselves born to serve, to protect, to save their fellow-men? Hercules went to the gods; but never would he have gone, unless, while still on earth, he had trod the path of service."

If, in these later days, the grateful admiration of the race towards its benefactors stops short of apotheosis, let us not on this account deem it less earnest or sincere. The glorious visions that once lent an awful sanctity to the Olympian peaks,—sung in the magnificent hexameters of Homer and Virgil, and wrought into shapes of almost living beauty by the chisel of Phidias and his nameless peers,—have passed away forever from the faith of men; and no new hero or demigod shall ever swell that congress of celestial forms whose loveliness is still immortal in the heart of every Schiller. The Acropolis and the Pantheon are deserted by their ancient deities, or haunted by their lifeless ghosts alone; but Fame, ever active and unforgetting, has built a new Pantheon in the soul of Man, and enshrines within it her beloved names. The great servants of the race are deified no more; but in the temple of History, they shall still stand in imperishable marble, crowned with gratitude, reverence, and everlasting honor. The human race has not forgotten to admire. The human heart has not unlearned to love. Whoever has given himself to labors that bring a blessing to mankind, is remembered to-day with nobler sentiments than those of superstitious worship. Genius and learning, philanthropy and spiritual greatness, command to-day a nobler homage than that of bended knees, or clouds of incense, or prayers of slavish adoration.

If this be otherwise, why are we here now? What means this gathering of ours, if it be not the spontaneous tribute of free souls to a great and noble benefactor? What value or significance have our festivities, if they express no sense of indebtedness, no feeling of honest and profound gratitude, to one whose giant intellect was consecrated to universal ends? Other services may create more immediate and tangible results, may bestow more palpable gain in physical comfort or material advantage, may dazzle the people's eyes with exploits more full of noise and cheap display; yet of all services that conduce to the highest good of man, he renders the most illustrious who enlarges the bounds of knowledge, and unlocks the treasure-chambers of truth. To discover the secret ways of Nature, to unveil the laws which lie at the bottom of all changes and all events, to grasp the system of the universe in its totality and climb that dizzy pinnacle of intellectual contemplation from which the Many shall be beheld as the One,—what object of ambition could be sublimer than this in its promise, or more magnificently fruitful of good in its achievement? Could it but be realized in full, the great enigma of the Sphinx would be forever solved; man would comprehend his destiny, and behold all Being from its central point. This, indeed, is an object impossible of attainment by any human intelligence; the finite can never expand into the infinite. But next in importance to the Unity of Being is the Unity of Knowledge; and this is an object not hopelessly beyond the limits of human thought. To accomplish this object is to make the nearest possible approach toward complete comprehension of the Universe, and to bring the human mind into the highest possible harmony with Nature. Here lies the road to perfect living. It was the supreme maxim of the ancient Stoics "to live according to Nature,"—a maxim loftier and deeper than any of the world's gospels; and the first step towards this natural living must be a comprehension of the physical Cosmos which we inhabit and of which we are a part. To take the first step, and make it a permanent advance of humanity, is the great end of physical science; and of all those whose labors have contributed to complete and organize our knowledge of the physical Cosmos into one vast, harmonious whole, no one has rendered services so important as the Baron von Humboldt.

It is to express our grateful appreciation of this stupendous benefit, by celebrating the centennial anniversary of his birth, that we have here assembled. Nor this alone. The man was worthy of his work; and because the intellectual Titan of the nineteenth century possessed a private character fitted to command respect and win affection, our conscientious acknowledgments soften into admiration,—our gratitude melts into love. During his lifetime, France and Germany contended for the glory of his vast acquisitions and services to science; but now that for ten years he has slumbered peacefully in his honored grave, America too comes forward, and claims him for universal man. To no petty province of the globe, to no isolated nation of the race, shall his name be narrowed or his fame confined; it is mankind that he has benefited, and to mankind he belongs. Fresh be his laurels as the years roll by! Green be his memory, and undying his renown, in the heart of universal humanity!

To undertake the task of giving a complete or connected view of Humboldt's career, would transcend not merely the proprieties of this occasion, but my own abilities as well. So indissolubly bound together were his scientific investigations and his private life, that only another Humboldt could be Humboldt's worthy biographer. Colossal greatness demands a colossal interpreter. Yet I should be wanting to your expectations, were I wholly to pass over the salient points of his career. A few words will suffice to indicate these.

Friedrich Heinrich Alexander von Humboldt was born Sept. 14, 1769,—the same year in which Sir Walter Scott, Cuvier, Napoleon, and Wellington first saw the light. His parents belonged to wealthy and aristocratic families, and his childhood was spent with his brother William (who was two years his senior) in the gray old castle of Tegel, situated near the beautiful Tegel Lake and only a few miles from Berlin. Although provided with the very best instructors, it is a singular fact that Alexander was a dull boy, and that Kunth, his tutor, and Dr. Heim, his teacher in botany, drew unfavorable comparisons between him and William with respect to native capacity. The greatest minds are not the earliest to develop. But ambition and latent genius at last prevailed, and at the universities of Frankfurt on the Oder and Goettingen Alexander gradually came to a consciousness of his powers. A strong friendship grew up at the latter place between him and George Forster, the son-in-law of Prof. Heyne and companion of Capt. Cook in one of his famous voyages around the world. Forster's society had a profound influence in strengthening Alexander's desire to make scientific journeys in tropical countries; while the freedom and boldness of thought with which Forster handled political and religious subjects, increased that natural tendency to liberality of opinion which was so marked a characteristic of Humboldt's mind.

After various journeys in Belgium, Holland, England, Silesia, Poland, Switzerland, Spain, etc., and after a long series of disappointments in his plans, at last, in 1799, Humboldt obtained permission from the king of Spain to travel throughout all Spanish America, without any vexatious conditions or checks upon his freedom. It is a noteworthy coincidence that Columbus, the geographical discoverer of America, and Humboldt, its scientific discoverer, both entered upon their great enterprises under the auspices of Spain. In company with Aime Bonpland, the second Columbus commenced that journey of five years' duration in the tropical regions of America which has immortalized his name as the greatest of all scientific travellers.

It would be impossible for us to follow him in wanderings which appall the imagination by their vastness, or to epitomize investigations which embrace the whole circle of the sciences. Now traversing vast plains or Llanos, which in the summer lie beneath the burning skies as parched and dusty deserts, and in the winter are converted by inundations into an immense inland sea,—now slung in hammocks at night on the edge of the primeval forests, while the wild outcries of monkeys and parrots, of peccaries, tapirs, and sloths, excited by terror at the pursuit of jaguars, filled the woods with a nocturnal uproar begging all description,—now floating in frail canoes over the river Apure, the Rio Negro, the Cassiquiare, the Atabapo, the Orinoco, while scaly crocodiles lay alongside the banks, with motionless jaws upraised and sometimes half-covered with fearless birds,—now climbing the snowy peaks of the volcanoes of Pichincha, Cotopaxi, or Chimborazo, until from the diminished pressure of the atmosphere blood gushed from the eyes, lips, and gums,—now roaming over the classic plateau of Caxamarca, famous for the exploits of ruthless Pizarro and the melancholy fortunes of his victim, the Inca Atahualpa,—now crossing the lofty ridge of the Andes, and so filled with joy at the long-desired sight of the broad, beautiful Pacific, as to neglect to take a barometrical measurement of the altitude attained, and thus for the first time to forget the love of science in the love of beauty,—Humboldt, with his faithful companion, achieved peaceful triumphs in the pursuit of knowledge which will be gratefully remembered, when the crimson stained laurels of Napoleon and of Wellington shall have withered into dust. Hardships and dangers manifold were the price he paid. Near the town of Cumana, Humboldt and Bonpland were attacked by a fierce Zambo,—that is, a savage of mixed Indian and Negro blood,—with knife and bludgeon; and, being wholly unarmed, they were rescued only by the timely arrival and interference of some Biscayan merchants. On the foamy waters of the Orinoco, the little vessel which carried the travellers were nearly sunk during a high wind by the carelessness of the steersman, the waves having actually covered his papers and specimens. At the missionary station of Esmeralda, Humboldt narrowly escaped death from the terrible Curare poison, which is fatal if mingled, even in the minutest quantity, with the blood; a little bottle of the poison had leaked into his clothing over night, and he was about to thrust his foot, which was sorely bitten by insects, into a poisoned stocking, when fortunately he perceived the stain. At Rio-Sinu, the two friends, approaching the shore for the purpose of botanizing by moonlight, almost fell into an ambuscade of naked desperadoes, armed and laden with chains, who were probably escaped criminals and would doubtless have murdered them, if they had not at once retreated. In the ascent of Chimborazo, Humboldt pushed his way up the heights far beyond the limits of previous travellers, and far beyond the limits of safety; while on the plain of Jorullo he descended, at the imminent risk of his life, two hundred and fifty feet into the burning crater of the central volcanic cone, clambering over the brittle pieces of lava whose doubtful cohesion alone saved him from the fate of Empedocles. To accomplish his great journey, he had converted into money his ancestral inheritance; and to improve to the utmost its great opportunities, he hazarded life and limb in the cause of science. Never surely had science a more devoted or self-sacrificing servant.

On his return to Europe in 1804, Humboldt was received with universal acclamations. The most eminent savants of the time, such as Cuvier, Gay-Lussac, Arago, Oltmann, Laplace, and others, lent their aid to arrange his vast materials: but nearly fifty years elapsed before they could be fully published. In 1827-28, he delivered at Berlin the famous course of sixty-one lectures which were the basis of his greatest work, "Cosmos." In 1829, at the request of the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, he undertook in company with Gustav Rose and the famous Ehrenberg his second great journey into Central Asia. Under the liberal arrangements made by the Czar, he studied with signal success the formations of the Ural Mountains and the entire natural phenomena of Central Asia, as far as the boundaries of the Chinese Dsungarei. After nine months of most widely extended observations, important beyond expression in the eye of science, the expedition reached home; and Humboldt, having acquired sufficient materials for yet another life-time of patient elaboration, devoted himself thenceforward to combining his results into comprehensive and harmonious form. Honored, as the world reckons honors, with the official promotions and distinguished personal confidence of his king, or, as I should prefer to state it, conferring on the king and court the honor of his acceptance of their empty distinctions,—he lived to the advanced age of nearly ninety years, laboring to the last on those works of genius which evince an intellectual grandeur as much loftier than the grandeur of kings, as the snow-crowned summit of Chimborazo is loftier than the palace of Sans Souci. On the 6th of May, 1859, he died,—venerated by both hemispheres as the Nestor of science and the friend of man.

Such is the bare outline of a career whose greatness cannot be estimated by its events, but only by its influence on civilization and the higher culture of mankind. The lives of intellectual men furnish poor material for romances. But a great character has an interest of its own, quite independent of dramatic scenes. The sky-piercing peaks of the Himalayas are measured from the same level with inconspicuous hills,—the common level of the sea; and so the noblest and grandest characters must be measured from the level of those humble virtues which make the greatness of common men. I find in the biography and writings of Alexander von Humboldt evidence of many of the rarest excellences and sweetest graces that can dignify and adorn a human life.

He was magnanimous,—superior to that small jealousy, that mean envy of other reputations, which dims the brightness of so many a glorious name. To that contemptible appropriation of other men's labors as his own, which is best characterized as petty larceny of fame, he never stooped. "It has always afforded me pleasure," he writes (Cosmos, vol. v. p. 130, footnote), after acknowledging his indebtedness to other observers, "to record the names of those who have kindly assisted me in my labors." And throughout his works, it is delightful to notice how scrupulously he gives credit wherever it belongs. He was independent,—not afraid to utter his protest against injustice, not afraid to risk the displeasure of his sovereign by the frank expression of his honest thought. "May you be contented," he writes to his friend Varnhagen von Ense, "with him who, though standing alone, has courage to avow his own opinions!"

He was modest,—superior to the pride of rank and exalted station, simple in dress, gentle and courteous in manners to all alike,—superior, also, to the more subtle pride of learning and intellect, and never forgetful, in the vastness of his knowledge, that even his knowledge, compared with boundless truth, was as a drop compared with the ocean. He was generous and kind,—always eager to assist unappreciated merit, and always tireless in the service of any whom he could help. He was self-sacrificing,—devoted so unselfishly to science, that he quietly surrendered the comfort and ease and indolence of a nobleman's life, cheerfully sacrificed his property, and exposed himself to intense sufferings and hardships for the increase of knowledge among men. Nearly fifty years after his great South American journey, he playfully excuses his bad hand-writing on account of a lameness in his arm contracted in the forests of the Orinoco. He was warm-hearted,—tenderly attached to his friends, and so closely bound to his brother William by ties of fraternal affection, that the title of "the German Dioscuri" was applied to them. It would be difficult indeed to find two brothers more truly one. "I did not believe," he writes to Varnhagen from beside William's death-bed,—"I did not believe that my old eyes held so many tears!" It became to him a sacred duty, after his brother's death, to edit his posthumous works; and nothing could be more touching than to see Alexander's noble indignation at any slight seemingly offered to his brother's memory.

Throughout his writings he gives frank utterance to noble and generous sympathies for the oppressed, and, with a calmness far more scathing than vehemence, records his detestation of tyranny and inhumanity. He relates to Varnhagen an interview with Prince Albert, which contrasts the characters of the two men as darkness and light:—"I am severe," he writes, "upon the powerful alone; and this man was hateful to me at Stolzenfels. 'I know,' [said the Prince,] 'that you feel a deep pity for the wretchedness of the Russian Poles; but I am sorry to say, the Poles deserve our pity just as little as the Irish.' To me"—exclaims Humboldt, with biting scorn,—"to me he said it! And this is the handsome husband of the Queen of Great Britain!" (Corresp. p. 242). After giving an account of the persecution, by the Christian missionary of San Fernando, of a poor Indian mother who was carried off with her infant children, separated from them, mercilessly whipped, and at last driven to suicide by voluntary starvation, Humboldt, referring to a rock on the shores of the Atabo where she had endeavored to escape, still called "the rock of the mother," exclaims with deep feeling,—"The name of this rock will remain as a memorial of the moral perversity of our age, of the contrast between the virtue of the savage and the barbarism of civilized men. This is to the memory of a victim of the bigotry and savageness of miserable wretches, who called themselves servants of a religion whose first command is love of one's neighbor." (Life of Humboldt, p. 221.)

Quite as strong as his hatred of cruelty and slavery, was his love of freedom. With cutting sarcasm he ridicules the selfishness of aristocracy, adding—"This narrow spirit of caste knows neither place nor time" (Corresp. p. 71); he quotes the advice of a councillor of Philip II. who warned his master against the abuse of power, "lest God should become tired of monarchies" (Corresp. p. 192); and, in a public address to the inhabitants of Potsdam, he refers to "the enlarged proportions of a political life which progresses in obedience to laws inherent in the constitution of society" (Corresp. p. 258). In the Cosmos (vol. 1. p. 358), he utters these grand words:—"While we maintain the unity of the human species, we at the same time repel the depressing assumption of superior and inferior races of men. There are nations more susceptible of cultivation, more highly civilized, more ennobled by mental cultivation than others, but none in themselves nobler than others. All are in like degree designed for freedom." And what statement of the republican idea could be nobler than this, taken from the same immortal work (Vol. 2. p. 199)?—"The principle of individual and political freedom is implanted in the indestructible conviction of the equal rights of one sole human race. Thus mankind presents itself to our contemplation as one great fraternity, and one independent unity, striving for the attainment of one aim,—the free development of moral vigor."

Such was the spirit, and such the publicly expressed convictions, of Alexander von Humboldt, who, great as he was in scientific attainments, thus appears before us in the still higher greatness of free and noble manhood. The moral dangers of his position, as nobleman, courtier, and highly honored favorite of his king, he plainly bore in mind, when he wrote the significant words,—"Proximity to princes is apt to rob the most intellectual of their spirit and freedom" (Views of Nature, p. 382); yet his life is a striking proof of the truth of the old proverb,—"Forewarned is forearmed." Complying to some extent with court customs and formalities,—more, perhaps, than is quite in harmony with the sterner spirit of a republican born and bred,—he nevertheless stood erect even in the presence of royalty, and never abdicated the throne of his own self-respect. He cherished "unfading confidence in the advancement of humanity" (Corresp. p. 141); and when, after a seeming stroke of paralysis at the age of eighty-seven, a friend remarked to him in the king's presence, that he would not be able for some time to stand firmly on his left side, Humboldt replied, with the fresh wit and progressive spirit of youth,—"For all that, I shall not be obliged to sit on the right with Gerlach [i. e. with the conservatives]" (Corresp. p. 358). How nobly true was the old man to what he had declared, twenty years before, to be his "cherished aim,—that I may not become a fossil, so long as I can move, and cling to the conviction that 'Nature has put her curse upon standing-still'" (Corresp. p. 61).

It has seemed to me better, by quoting with freedom, to let Humboldt thus speak for himself, than to describe his character more formally in language of my own. What is lost in method, is thus more than made up in spirit. A great faith in humanity and progress shines out in these and similar sayings which will make his name dear to his fellow men, till the end of time.

Passing now from the private to the public aspect of his character, I wish to say a few words only concerning him as a man of science, an author, and a philosopher. Two intellectual traits, above all others, command the admiration of his readers in equal degree,—I mean his accuracy and fulness in details, and his comprehensiveness in universals; his keen and extensive observation of facts, and his profound and philosophic grasp of principles. The one enabled him to master the accumulated data of the various physical sciences, and to enrich them with his own independent additions; the other enabled him to arrange these data in their logical relations, and thus to organize the subordinate sciences into one grand science of Cosmography. These two traits were equally essential to the execution of the task he undertook. To enumerate his multifarious and voluminous works would subserve no proper end of this occasion; they may be regarded as furnishing material which has been condensed into the great work of Humboldt's life, the "Cosmos, or Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe." His services in special scientific departments were so various and so extensive, that they can be properly estimated by those alone who have become adepts in these departments; his discoveries and original investigations may almost be said to have created new sciences, as, for instance, that of the geographical distribution of plants and animals,—a study of which he may be properly called the founder. In magnetism, in thermotics, in geognosy, in comparative climatology, in meteorology, in botany, in fact, in every department of knowledge of the physical universe, Humboldt has left the mark of his genius, and laid mankind under permanent obligation to his amazing intellectual industry. Combining, as a writer, all the refinement of a highly cultivated taste with the masculine vigor of a thoroughly trained intellect, he has evinced the grand symmetry of his mental character by reconciling exact scientific description and reasoning with a truly poetical appreciation of Nature and a delicate sensibility to her finer aspects. In him, the artist and the savant have been wonderfully united in a single personality. Beauty of form is as conspicuous in his great work, as wealth of material. In fact, the mind of Humboldt illustrates a truth which is mostly overlooked,—that poetry becomes philosophy, and art becomes science, when elevated from the region of the senses to the region of ideas. It is as truly a work of creative mind to elaborate a system of scientific or philosophic truth that shall charm the higher reason, as it is to create in marble or on the canvass a beautiful form that shall charm the eye. Hence it is that, by the universality of his development, Humboldt stands as perhaps the completest modern type or illustration of symmetrical culture; he is, at the same time, an eloquent protest against the restraints of artificial civilization and antiquated religion, and also a fine instance of the commanding stature possible to unoppressed humanity. Poetry and philosophy, art and science, dissevered and even antagonistic on the plane of common life, are carried up and blended into a grand unity in the cosmopolitan soul of Humboldt. Only from such a soul, combining attributes and powers deemed usually so incompatible, could a great work like the Cosmos, at once scientific and artistic, have proceeded. To him, eternal truth appeared clad in garments of eternal beauty, and Nature revealed herself as "a living whole" [ein lebendiges Ganzes]. "I have always endeavored," he says (Corresp. p. 40), "to describe faithfully, to design correctly, and to be even scientifically true, without losing myself in the dry regions of knowledge." This is the spirit of the true artist; and it renders the Cosmos something more than a mere encyclopedia of science,—it raises it to the rank of a production of true creative genius.

But it must be remembered (and Humboldt himself never forgot it) that the Cosmos aims only to unify the physical universe. No one could more clearly recognize the boundaries of physical science. "From the remotest nebulae," he says (Cosmos, Vol. 1. p. 359), "and from the revolving double stars, we have descended to the minutest organisms of animal creation, whether manifested in the depths of ocean or on the surface of our globe, and to the delicate vegetable germs which clothe the naked declivity of the ice-crowned mountain summit; and here we have been able to arrange these phenomena according to partially known laws; but other laws of a more mysterious nature rule the higher spheres of the organic world, in which is comprised the human species in all its varied conformation, its creative intellectual power, and the languages to which it has given existence. A physical delineation of Nature terminates at the point where the sphere of intellect begins, and a new world of mind is opened to our view. It marks the limit, but does not pass it."

In accordance with this clear conception of the boundaries of physical science, Humboldt also disclaims the intention of seeking to create a speculative philosophy of Nature, constructed by the method of absolute deduction. "It is not the purpose of this essay on the physical history of the world," he says (Cosmos, Vol. 1. p. 49), "to reduce all sensible phenomena to a small number of abstract principles based on reason only. The physical history of the universe, whose exposition I attempt to develop, does not pretend to rise to the perilous abstractions of a purely rational science of Nature, and is simply a physical geography, combined with a description of the regions of space and the bodies occupying them. . . . The unity which I seek to attain in the development of the great phenomena of the universe is analogous to that which historical composition is capable of acquiring. . . . Physics, as the term signifies, is limited to the explanation of the phenomena of the material world by the properties of matter. The ultimate object of the experimental sciences is, therefore, to discover laws and to trace their progressive generalization. All that exceeds this goes beyond the province of the physical description of the universe, and appertains to a range of higher speculative views."

Now it is the recognition of the definite limits of physical science, and the recognition of the existence of a still higher science, which constitutes Humboldt a true philosopher, and proves his superiority to the positivist school of Auguste Comte. Using the words in their largest sense, physics and psychology denote the two great sciences of matter and of mind, and it is merely arbitrary to deny the existence of either. At the present day, it is perhaps impossible to realize fully that large scientific method which shall bind these two great branches of the universal science into organic unity. Yet it is becoming clear that all science is one, and that a single method, obeying the same essential ideas, shall at last dominate all investigation into the truth of things. Hitherto physical science has rested too confidently on the method of induction, philosophy on the method of deduction, religion on the method of assumption or faith; but the day is surely coming when the one universal scientific method shall unite these three, and thus at last create a Unity of Knowledge which may approximate, at least as far as it goes, to the Unity of Being. When it is once perceived that science must recognize deduction, that philosophy must recognize induction, and that both must recognize faith, then indeed shall the conception of the Cosmos be so enlarged as to include the physical and mental alike. Faith in law, in the unity of the universe, underlies both science and philosophy; and this is the primary truth which religion has perverted to the justification of absurd and baseless dogmas. The one great method of universal science, resting on faith in the unity of the universe, and combining induction and deduction in all investigation into the truth of Nature and of Mind, must in the end destroy all antagonism between physical science, philosophy and religion, and reveal at last the eternal harmonies of the all-comprehensive Whole.

The distinct perception of the limits of physical science which the great mind of Humboldt never suffered to become obscured in the execution of his vast undertaking, prevented him from going out of his self-appointed path to conciliate the prejudice of the Church. To the huge Cerberus of the popular religion, with its three heads of superstition, ignorance and bigotry, he never condescended to throw a sop. Calmly and with dignity, he proceeded to unfold the unity of law which pervades the entire universe of matter, to exhibit the self-consistency of Nature in her eternal round of Protean metamorphoses, and to reveal in its majestic simplicity the order and beauty of the great "living Whole." In these sublime truths, rational and free religion finds its essential basis; and only intense bigotry could assail a work permeated with such ideas as irreligious or atheistical. Yet terrified orthodox denounced Humboldt for presenting a "universe without a God." True, the God of orthodoxy is not even once mentioned in the Cosmos, nor did Humboldt have any faith in such a God. But I have found in its pages nothing whatever inconsistent with that idea of God which accepts the universe as it is without reserve, and beholds in physical Nature a sublime manifestation of eternal Being. He who condemns Humboldt's Cosmos as atheistical, because it ignores God, should condemn the Census Report for the same reason; the one is as atheistical as the other. If it be atheism to regard the God of orthodoxy as a mere idol of human imagination, the best intelligence of the world is certainly growing atheistical; but if it is impossible, as I believe it is, to deny the existence of an Infinite Power in Nature and in Mind, which makes the existence of the universe an endlessly fresh creation of beauty and of life, then the charge of atheism, whether brought against Humboldt or against the world, is a vulgar slander of the church. "Unbelievers," says Emerson, "hang the believers for want of belief." There is more true faith in the works of Humboldt, devoted as they are to the conscientious pursuit of truth, than in all the bitter clamors raised against them on the score of their irreligion.

It would be a very incomplete treatment of my subject, however, were I thus to evade distinct reference to Humboldt's religious opinions. The Cosmos is strictly what it purports to be,—a physical description of the universe, and nothing more. Respecting strictly the natural limitations of his task, throughout the Cosmos he refrains from entering upon any irrelevant discussions. A lady once asked the Earl of Shaftesbury what religion he was of. "The religion," he replied, "of all sensible men." "And what is that?" persisted the lady. "That, Madam," replied the Earl, "sensible men never tell." In his printed publications, Humboldt adopted the Earl's policy; but in conversation and in the freedom of correspondence with his intimate friend, Varnhagen von Ense, he expressed his ideas of religion on many occasions. His opinion of church-going and of the clergy was peculiar. Gerlach, a conservative leader who was believed to have secured the royal favor through hypocritical piety, once remarked to Humboldt, "Your Excellency frequently goes to church nowadays, do you not?" Humboldt coolly and sarcastically replied, "Your nowadays is very kind of you. You doubtless wish to point out to me the only road which, at present, could lead to my promotion." The ministers certainly hated him, and would have secured his banishment, he says, were it not for his position at Court. In his diary, Varnhagen preserves a sharp sarcasm of Humboldt on his pigny antagonists:—"In a box he had a living chameleon, which he showed me, and of which he said, that it was the only animal which was able to direct one of its eyes upwards, and at the same time the other downwards; that our parsons only were able to do the same, with one eye directed to heaven and the other to the good things of the world."

Concerning religion and Christianity, Humboldt wrote as follows:—"All positive religions contain three distinct parts,—first, a code of morals, very pure and nearly the same in all—next, a geological dream—and thirdly, a myth or little historical romance; which last becomes the most important of all." (Corresp. p. 112). "The dogmas of former ages survive now only in the superstitions of the people and the prejudices of the ignorant, or are perpetuated in a few systems which, conscious of their weakness, shroud themselves in a veil of mystery." (Cosmos, Vol. 1. p. 24). "A philosophically proved Christian dogmatism of 'marked physiognomy' seems to me the most offensive of all strait-waistcoats." (Corresp. p. 78). He also describes himself as "delighted" with Strauss's Life of Jesus (Corresp. p. 122) and styles the Evangelists,—"apostolic collectors of myths." In another letter he refers to another work of Strauss, the "Christliche Glaubenslehre:—"The method of the author is excellent; it makes us acquainted with the whole history of the faith of our time, particularly so with the jesuitical trick of so many people who declare publicly their belief in and their adherence to all the dogmas of the Christian mythology, after the fashion of Schleiermacher; and who, after having 'drained the chalice,' are followed to the grave by a solemn cortege of court equipages, although in fact they had always discarded the orthodox belief, and substituted for it pseudo-philosophical interpretations." (Corresp. p. 128).

Various attempts were made by evangelical believers to convert Humboldt to their Christian faith, but without success. A letter was received by him in 1852, from a German in Montgomery County, Ohio, urging him most earnestly and even affectionately to become a Christian. This letter was sent to Varnhagen, suggesting that he should "deposit this curious, good-natured letter among his psychological curiosities." (Corresp. p. 272). Other attempts at his conversion met with no better success; and, notwithstanding the very singular statements which have been made that Humboldt accepted Christianity, it is sufficiently clear from these extracts that he continued to the last a liberal and free man. For him the Bible had no authority whatever, when inconsistent with the teachings of science or of reason; and although he recognized the general purity of Christian morals, he felt no reverence for Christian dogmas. The universality and invariability of natural law is the great faith of modern science: and never has it shone with brighter lustre than in the soul of Humboldt. Miracle, whether claimed by theology or by that mongrel mixture of theology and science which accepts occasional epochs of miraculous creation, was utterly foreign to his thought, utterly inconsistent with his conception of Nature as a "living whole." The science which accepts miraculous creative epochs is an attempt at compromise between contradictory ideas; and the same judgment should be passed upon it, which a German friend of mine, in a letter lately received, passed upon Protestant theology. "Protestant theology," he wrote, "is the Pope with a liberty cap on his head; the people look at the cap and call him liberty." Science will admit no miracles at all, whether in large or small amounts. Humboldt, as the completest representative of modern science, stands for the unity of Nature, for the universality of law, for the order and beauty of one harmonious Cosmos. And since he also stands for universal liberty and equal rights, for the endlessness of human progress and the brotherhood of man, let us cherish his memory in our hearts as that of a great and noble benefactor, whose life is a grand inspiration in the pursuit of truth, of liberty, and of brotherly love among all men.

EARNESTNESS THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

I feel as if it were not for me to record, even though this manuscript is intended for no eyes but mine, how hard I worked at that tremendous short-hand, and all improvement appertaining to it, in my sense of responsibility to Dora and her aunts. I will only add, to what I have already written of my perseverance at this time of my life and of a patient and continuous energy which then began to be matured within me, and which I know to be the strong part of my character, if it have any strength at all, that there, on looking back, I find the source of my success. I have been very fortunate in worldly matters; many men have worked much harder, and not succeeded half so well; but I never could have done what I have done, without the habits of punctuality, order, and diligence, without the determination to concentrate myself on one object at a time, no matter how quickly its successor should come upon its heels, which I then formed. Heaven knows I write this in no spirit of self-laudation. The man who reviews his own life, as I do mine, in going on here from page to page, had need to have been a good man indeed, if he would be spared the sharp consciousness of many talents neglected, many opportunities wasted, many erratic and perverted feelings constantly at war within his breast, and defeating him. I do not hold one natural gift, I dare say, that I have not abused. My meaning simply is, that whatever I have tried to do in life, I have tried with all my heart to do well; that whatever I have devoted myself to, I have devoted myself to completely; that, in great aims and in small, I have always been thoroughly in earnest. I have never believed it possible that any natural or improved ability can claim immunity from the companionship of the steady, plain, hard-working qualities, and hope to gain its end. There is no such thing as such fulfilment on this earth. Some happy talent, and some fortunate opportunity, may form the two sides of the ladder on which some men mount, but the rounds of that ladder must be made of stuff to stand wear and tear; and there is no substitute for thorough-going, ardent and sincere earnestness. Never to put one hand to anything on which I could not throw my whole self; and never to affect depreciation of my work, whatever it was; I find, now, to have been my golden rules.

A CLERGYMAN in Glasgow used to relate the following:—In marrying a couple, he asked the bride, in the usual form of the Presbyterian Church, whether she would be "a loving, faithful, and obedient wife?" The bride promptly replied that she would promise to be loving and faithful, but would not venture on a pledge of uniform obedience. The minister paused and demurred. "Just say awa', sir," ejaculated the bridegroom, "she has promised to be lovin' and faithful; an' foul fa thae fingers," raising his fist, "gin she's no obedient."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I am well pleased with the tenor and chain of thought usually found in THE INDEX. True, I find sentiments contained therein which do not strictly accord with my own. Neither would the paper be half so welcome, if it only chimed with my own notes. Acids and alkalis are very antagonistic until brought together, and, after great fumigation, they neutralize and quiet each other. It is by this bringing together of ideas opposed to my own, that I hope to quiet the acidity and fumigations of my own mind.

Of one thing I have long been convinced, and that is that the people have too long been taught to look back from 1800 to 5000 years for their landmarks of right and wrong and truth, when really those landmarks were set up for the guidance of a then benighted people. We have never been taught to look to ourselves, the present and the future, for lights to guide us into all truth. We have been educated in the belief there was an all-powerful being who died, and that in that death there is a propitiation for our sins. Being filled with that belief, it causes us to cease our own exertions, and throw the burden of what we should do on another. These are evils that THE INDEX is trying to remove, and I wish it great success."

—"I learn from Mr. — (whom I met in New York recently) that you are meeting with good success. Allow me to assure you that this intelligence greatly rejoiced me. My sympathies are deeply in your favor, as I regard the free religious movement paramount to every other interest now claiming the attention of the American people. Allow me to say also that, when the facts of Spiritualism come to be generally recognized by the free thinkers, an impetus will be given to the movement that will insure success. As you justly said in a recent editorial, immortality can only be proven by facts. I have had the facts presented, and therefore know it. Others are as highly favored. And ere long, all who are willing will get there."

—"I am extremely pleased with your success, and hope it will continue. It is extremely wholesome for the people to have a journal that will never falter, but give its readers honest thought upon whatever subject it speaks. You would have reason to find fault with me, did I withhold the word I add. Some of your friends have criticised the 'taste' of publishing the warm praises of yourself and writings which your enthusiastic friends send you. I simply state the fact. I look for THE INDEX every week with interest, and am keeping a file religiously, as I do the Radical and Woman's Journal."

—"Through the kindness of one of your patrons, I received a sample copy of THE INDEX. It meets my approval, and herewith find one dollar, for which please send me THE INDEX six months on trial. I would suggest that you send a sample copy of the paper to Rev. —. He examined mine and was very much pleased with it. He is a very good and liberal man."

—"Our family have taken THE INDEX the past three months and find it rich in spiritual food, and we feel that we cannot do without it. We have distributed, among liberal-minded people, most of the Nos. received. Hoping that others may receive the joy and comfort we have experienced from their perusal, &c."

—"I see you still advertise bound volumes of THE INDEX, (Vol. I), for sale. Will you please put my name down for one copy. I enjoy your paper exceedingly. I think the position you have taken a perfectly logical one. I do not see how any middle ground can be consistently taken."

—"If a man wants a free soul in his corpus, let him take THE INDEX. Every No. which I read makes every spiritual nerve in me thrill and tingle with thankfulness and joy."

—"It is really health-inspiring, among such a parcel of blatant hypocrites as we find here in the 'hub,' to find in your INDEX a little common sense."

Poetry.

ALL ALONE.

Longing for the merry din,
 All alone,—
 Going out and coming in,
 All alone!
 Children's noises fill the street;
 But within no more I greet
 Sound of little hurrying feet,
 Welcoming of voices sweet,—
 All alone!

In our still and empty home,
 All alone,—
 In our own accustomed room,
 All alone,—
 In the nursery and the hall,
 As my sounding footsteps fall,
 From the ceiling and the wall
 Echo answers to my call.
 All alone!

Playthings in their place, of course,
 All alone!
 Stabled safe the rocking-horse,
 All alone!
 Blocks and ninepins, by the score
 Tossed about the nursery floor,
 With my foot or with the door
 In the dusk I strike no more,—
 All alone!

Silence sits beside my chair,
 All alone!
 Silence walks with me the stair,
 All alone!
 Where I watched each pillowed head
 Breathing soft with lips of red,
 Silence, deep as of the dead,
 Sleeps in crib and trundle-bed.
 All alone!

Little pictures in my hand—
 All alone—
 Tears start up, as long I stand
 All alone!
 Lone as Crusoe on his isle,
 Loneliness I can't beguile
 With these pictured lips the while;
 Oh for one sweet living smile,
 All alone!

Dost thou ever think of me,
 All alone?
 Papa dost thou ask to see,
 All alone?
 Playing still thy childish part,
 Bent on whipstick, drum, or cart,
 Can'st thou know thy father's heart?
 Not till thou a father art—
 All alone!

Why should thoughts of me, so far,
 All alone,
 Come thy merriment to mar?
 All alone!
 Swift, full swift the shadows creep;
 Soon enough with longing deep
 Wilt thou think of me, and weep,
 Lying in my quiet sleep
 All alone!

So forget me in the game,
 All alone!
 I shall love thee still the same,
 All alone!
 Evie, pound the old tin-pan,
 Drive the harnessed chairs a-span!
 Blow thy trumpet, little Stan!
 By and by thou'lt be a man—
 All alone!

MITRAILLEUR MND MITRAILLEUSE.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

Mitrailleux—mitrailleuse—
 That weapon that's to play the deuce
 With Prussian troops, by such a rattling,
 Upon the principle of Gatling,
 Of bullets fierce, that all will fain
 Skedaddle from its leaden rain—
 Wie heisst, Mein Herr, this ravager,
 Mitrailleuse—or mitrailleux?
 Upon the answer must depend Vast consequences to each friend
 Of woman suffrage. Do you say
 The point of this escapes you, eh?
 Why, mitrailleux is masculine,
 And mitrailleuse is feminine;
 Now woman, some say, has no right
 To vote unless she'll also fight;
 And if this fearful bullet-sender
 Prove to be of the female gender,
 Why then the sex can vote—that's flat—
 'Cause it can slaughter. Verbum sat.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 10, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also, when issued, a bound volume of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind.

The near approach of the anniversary of Humboldt's birthday (Sept. 14) will doubtless recall to many minds the numerous celebrations of last year, which proved that, with all its seeming immersion in practical pursuits, the world yet delights to honor the great minds that dedicate themselves to science and liberal ideas.

We republish to-day an oration delivered at that time in Toledo.

WORK AND KID GLOVES.

A gentleman, on whose good opinion we set great value, wrote us from Boston not long ago as follows:—"You would have reason to find fault with me, did I withhold the word I add. Some of your friends have criticized the 'taste' of publishing the warm praises of yourself and writings which your enthusiastic friends send you. I simply state the fact." For criticism thus frankly and kindly transmitted we have only the sincerest thanks to return. Now for the main point.

No one who has attentively read THE INDEX can have failed to notice that we print praise and blame with perfect impartiality. Sneers and slanders can be found in our pages without difficulty by any one who will take the trouble to turn them over. It would be unjust to 'ourselves not to add that the words of warmest sympathy we have refrained from giving to the public, because they seemed too personal.

Now he must be made of cheap stuff who cares greatly what is said about him by the world. The man who has learned to find his best friend in his own self-respect, and never suffers an inward rebuke to go unheeded, is equally incapable of elation by praise or depression by blame. There is no better proof of the toughness of fibre which belongs to true manhood than superiority to these mere accidents of life. Whoever remembers that the world at large knows nothing of his secret motives, which his most intimate friends often cruelly misunderstand, must be shallow-brain-ed indeed to lay much stress on chance-puffs of the popular breeze, whether in his favor or otherwise; while he who should be so bewitched by a little commendation as to blurt it into all ears for the sake of gratifying his own vanity, would prove that his admirers were even greater fools than he.

But there is a sickly modesty, a false taste, in modern society, which every independent mind will look upon with unmixed contempt. Reticence may be a stronger proof of vanity than speech. Of all forms of egotism, mock-modesty is the worst. Business men violate no law of real modesty, when they advertise their wares and offer public testimonials to their value, provided they tell no lies about them. What would be thought of the patentee of a new machine, who should shrink from legitimate advertising because he dreaded the appearance of blazoning his own ability as an inventor? The business world has too much sense to draw any such inferences from his advertisements, since it knows his purpose to be the introduction of his machine into general use; and it would infer from a refusal to advertise, either that he did not have much faith in his own article, or else that he was strangely lacking in what is vulgarly but very expressively termed "gumption."

Now what every sensible business man does, we do also,—that is, we advertise. He advertises his merchandise because he hopes to make money by its sale; we advertise our ideas because we hope they will make men freer, wiser, and happier. Just as he publishes testimonials to the worth of his goods, we publish testimonials to the worth of ours; with this difference, that he publishes only favorable notices, while we publish impartially whatever we receive, whether favorable or unfavorable. The business man's object is money-getting, which is honorable enough in itself; while we trust that our object is a higher and a nobler one, because it concerns, not our own private advantage, but the advantage of the whole human race. Our point is this, that all talk about "taste" is as irrelevant in one case, as in the other.

Hoping as we do to make THE INDEX an instrument for emancipating American society from cramping superstitions, and for doing real service in fostering noble ideals of private and public life, we do not intend to reject the necessary means of success through any fastidiousness of temperament or mere daintiness of "taste." We have not taken up this work because of its intrinsic beauty. It is hard, distasteful, grim, unlovely,—this work of combating public prejudice and disturbing public self-complacency in degrading follies. If we had consulted mere inclination in the matter, we should have left it most severely alone, and followed a very different life. But the work needs to be done; and, having once undertaken it, we do not mean to let any false delicacy neutralize our efforts. It was the worst possible "taste" for the abolitionists to agitate against African slavery; it is the worst possible "taste" for us to agitate against American slavery. But slavery is slavery, and we hate it, whether of body or soul. The elegant ease of dilettantism has its charms; but the stern, dusty, sweaty struggle for freedom has its solemn obligation. And we do not expect to go through the campaign in satin slippers or kid gloves.

"But what has all this do with publishing praises of yourself?"

Much,—if you can see nothing but "praises of self" in what we publish. What we see is something vastly different,—the great yearning and battling of the age to shake off the crushing weight of a slave-system that rides the nineteenth century as the "Old Man of the Sea" rode Sindbad the sailor. But let this pass.

There is nothing that the awakening people needs so sorely as to see that the demand for greater spiritual liberty is a universal one. The whole modern world is stirring like the fabled giant under Mt. Ætna. But so great is the prestige of Christianity, and so visible is its influence everywhere, that liberal minds feel chilled by their apparent fewness and isolation. They do not realize that they have more or less the sympathy of millions. This is the tone of a great many letters we have received. It is a positive surprise to many such minds to find that they are thinking the thoughts of the age. Whatever makes this revelation is a powerful encouragement and help. That is why we are so glad to print expressions, however crude, of this deep, underlying sentiment of a longing for free religious ideas. If they take the form of commendation of something we may have happened to write, what is that to us? We have written altogether too much not to know the inadequacy of our own writings, and are not so steeped in vanity as to take to ourself what is meant for the truth. These letters and communications, which seem to casual readers to be the empty compliments of mere enthusiasm, are the testimonies of full hearts to the priceless value of truths which we strive to utter. Look deeper, friendly critics,—look down into the souls of those who have written, and, in their "praises" of one who has poorly interpreted to them their own secret thoughts, read the prayer of our common humanity for freedom and for light. Nearly all of the writers are utter strangers to us—what makes them write? The heart of this people throbs with conscious or unconscious longing for something better than Christianity has to give; and we should as wisely take to ourself the words it prompts, as the red and white bunting of the Stars and Stripes would arrogate to itself the deep devotion to free government which a few years ago made a whole nation leap to its defence.

No—these "praises" that offend your "taste" are not for us, but the ideas we work for; and that is why we print them. We have no apology to make, and no reformation to promise. No part of THE INDEX, we believe, is more universally read than the "Voices from the People." The people read what the people write; and it is a glorious thought that the people itself is the true prophet of Free Religion. Our own connection with it is purely accidental, nor are we at all essential to it. Should we die to-morrow, a better would take our place. But we do not mean to be tied by any rules of conventional "modesty." We make our own rules, and will pay the price of liberty. Send us your thoughtful criticism, friends,—we care not whether it be praise or blame. And if we judge it of any service to the truth, we will print it, though it cost us the last shred of our reputation for "modesty" or "taste."

Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, sends us a pleasant little note, promising to answer Dr. Bland's "Open Letter" as soon as may be. We shall welcome his reply, and cordially offer as large a space in our columns as he may wish to occupy.

WHO AND WHAT IS GOD?

SPRINGDALE, CEDAR CO., IOWA, Aug. 2, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Having but lately commenced reading your valuable paper, I may be asking for a repetition of ideas from you. I notice that you attach much importance to the worship of God. What God? The unknown God? In one or more of your lectures, you speak with definiteness in regard to one, and the worship of the same. Have you really solved the enigma of what God is? Has science or sound learning positively demonstrated that which men have so long puzzled their brains over? Or is it still only a play on words, the old imaginary God? I feel that, when I worship, I prefer to do so intelligently,—to have a definite idea of what I worship, and to know that the being or thing that I give homage and adoration to has at least the capacity to appreciate my sincerity. The God born of earthquakes and storms in fear-stricken minds is, to say the least, a doubtful one. I am in the position of knowing nothing in regard to the facts of the case, and in this am only one of many. We cannot accept as evidence that which has for its basis only theory and speculation. We ask for logic or facts; conjecture is well enough when offered as such, but becomes ridiculous when given as fact. I admit that the all-pervading harmony in created things gives a basis for analogical reasoning; but there it ends to me. Further than this I cannot go. I confess a lack of that which is termed "inner light," and cannot, with intuition and intelligence combined, have the most remote idea whether there is one, fifty, or an indefinite number of Gods. But I am anxious to hear logical deductions made in the premises, and would ask what are the evidences of a God. Heretofore we have been answered from the pulpit by arbitrary assertions; now we ask for a little more than husks.

You have undertaken a noble work. The fogs of the past still obstruct the light. Our sympathies are with you, and we will endeavor to help to hold up your hands in the good work; and if we seem exacting in holding you to your text, you will, we hope, appreciate the fact that we regard you as our agent for sowing the seed which we have full faith in believing will at length return a full harvest of developed manhood.

Yours sincerely,
GEO. B. GILL.

[It is manifestly impossible to discuss in a dozen lines subjects so vast as those above suggested. We must request our correspondent, whose kind words we fully appreciate, to wait till time and opportunity shall permit us to tell more fully than we have yet done why we believe in God, and what we believe about him. These are questions which Mr. Gill has a perfect right to ask; and he may depend on our endeavor, at least, to give intelligible answers.—ED.]

HENRY C. WRIGHT.

SALEM, Ohio, August 31, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I ask a small space in your valuable paper to give expression of my feeling on the death of Henry C. Wright, who died at Pawtucket, Rhode Island, on the 15th inst.

What can I, an obscure individual, say of one so worthy? It is rare presumption to make the attempt. But this I must, and will say,—that deep down in my heart's core I am constrained to say that a more noble and unselfish man never lived than he. To a great extent he was my spiritual father. No one am I so much indebted to for aid in breaking the mental and theological chains that bound me in my orthodox days, as to that good man, Henry C. Wright.

How often in this uncertain world, when the vile and wicked die, mausoleums are raised over their graves, and lying and nauseating obituaries herald their apocryphal virtues! To such an extent is this prevalent, that true friends shrink from saying anything about the worthy dead. When I say I believe that a more unselfish man never lived, I draw it from personal experience, and from the record of his life. In his orthodox days he was a Sunday School agent, receiving fifteen hundred dollars a year. At that time it was about as large a salary as the church gave to any of her agents. The road to theological fame was straight and bright before him. A life of ease, luxury, and dandling, held out enchanting allurements. His family relations were all strongly orthodox. Yet all this, and more, he heroically turned his back on, when the opening light of truth sternly pointed out another road, even the thorny road, the pathway of martyrs. He saw the poor bleeding slave pining in his despair, no eye to pity or hand to save; and the Church, Levite and Priest in essence, passing by on the other side, giving no heed or aid to his necessities. Then did he, with strong hands and strong heart, fly to the rescue; and by his acts he said,—"Perish all selfish considerations, when God's sable children cry so beseechingly for help!" And thus did he go forth on the great mission of humanity, never asking or receiving one dollar from the American or Western Anti-slavery societies to aid him in his work of love. His life stands an almost unparalleled monument of disinterested benevolence. I envy neither the head, nor the heart that pronounces him selfish. (For there are such, who ought to know better, who say he was selfish.) I feel warranted in saying that he was the first man in the nation, who stood up boldly, and in the face of a surly theology said,—"If the God of the Bible says, 'Stone a little child to death,' I will not stone the child, but will stone the God." "If the Bible says, man can hold property in man, the Bible is a self-evident lie." But why need I repeat those incidents? His whole life stands the embodiment of goodness and moral heroism more enduring than the solid marble or granite. The old book says, the memory of the wicked shall perish. The converse of the declaration is true, that deeds of love and mercy are immortal. And if they are immortal, must not the source from whence they come be immortal? Surely it must be so; and Henry C. Wright is immortal. Yes, verily—his great soul is "marching on," and in spirit life has he now joined that glorious band of the world's redeemers. G—.

A. J. DAVIS ON IMMORTALITY.

HYDE PARK, Mass., Aug. 28, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:

In THE INDEX of August 27, at the close of his interesting letter on Spontaneous Generation, INQUIRER asks,—“What becomes of the theological dream of an individualized, immortal soul?”

That question he will find scientifically discussed, and to many minds satisfactorily answered, by Andrew Jackson Davis in the fifth volume of the "Great Harmonia," on the "Origin of Life and the Law of Immortality."

Two sentences from it, which I will quote, indicate that the objection raised by INQUIRER was clearly in the mind of Mr. Davis, when writing his treatise. He says:—"The human soul is the focalized, concentrated extract or epitome of all the forces and vitalic laws which fill, inspire, and actuate the immeasurable empire of Nature and God."

He also says, and to many minds makes it evident, "that the inter-affinitized relations subsisting between the several essences and faculties of the human soul are stronger than the attraction to any essence or faculty outside of it." The inference is, then, evident, that the soul is immortal.

Yours fraternally,
ALFRED E. GILES.

"THE WORLD DOES MOVE."

MILWAUKEE, July 29, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Please to put me down for a bound volume of THE INDEX. I have all the numbers to date except two, which I understand cannot now be supplied. I am a regular reader of THE INDEX, which I obtain through the news-dealer in this city, who informs me that the demand for it in Milwaukee increases.

The matter contained in THE INDEX better meets my wants than any other religious literature that I can find. You have struck the grandest key yet touched in religious thought and life; and you have the sympathy of all who have at any time, however secretly, entertained the thought that "their souls are their own," and not the property of church and priest, the passive receptacles of stupid creeds and theological myths.

Doct. I. M. Wise, of Cincinnati, has delivered the first of a course of three lectures in this city on the origin of Christianity, in which he proposes to prove that Jesus Christ was not the author of Christianity. He claims that Jesus was a Jewish patriot, a noble and enthusiastic philanthropist laboring to liberate the Jews from the Roman yoke and to reclaim his brethren from the corruptions of their religion, which had resulted from Roman oppression.

He claims that the Roman authorities not only oppressed the Jews, but that they also attempted to fasten upon them the crime of killing Jesus Christ, who was murdered by the Romans. He claims that the killing of Jesus was caused by his apostles proclaiming him the Messiah, a claim which he not only did not make for himself, but which he objected to having made by his friends.

Dr. Wise undertakes to show that Christ did not attempt to introduce a new religion, and that the religion that bears his name was founded chiefly by Paul; also that the New Testament Scriptures were written and compiled some two centuries after the death of Christ and that they are mixed up with much that is false and absurd—that they do not furnish a correct history of the sayings, teachings, and doings of Christ.

These lectures are attended by prominent Protestant clergymen of the city, who will doubtless get much new light, as well as be set to thinking and possibly to reconstructing somewhat their notions of the Christian religion and of all other religions.

Religious thought and inquiry in this city is sympathizing strongly with the free spirit of the age; and the people seem drawn toward those among our clergy who honestly throw away the claims of authority, and enthrone in its place humanity and its interests.

The employment of the clergy is fast coming to be governed by the same principles which apply to the division of labor in general, and by the legitimate operation of the laws of supply and demand, which regulate all departments of industry. The products of thought and inquiry on religious matters that for ages have been forced upon the world are becoming dead stock on the market, which no pious trade-marks, however ancient, will sell. The demand is for something spontaneous and fresh from the unfailing sources of supply, to feed the hunger of an age that is not satisfied with old bones; and the minds that meet this want will have the preference in the religious market, which promises to become more and more active from this time forward.

Yours truly,

R. C. SPENCER.

THE ABSENCE OF INTERMEDIATE LINKS.

[The following extract from Darwin's Origin of Species, pp. 245-247, corrects a common misapprehension of the Development Theory, which does not seek intermediate links, e. g. between man and the apes, but between both and some common progenitor.]

In the sixth chapter I enumerated the chief objections which might be justly urged against the views maintained in this volume. Most of them have now been discussed. One, namely the distinctness of specific forms and their not being blended together by innumerable transitional links, is a very obvious difficulty. I assigned reasons why such links do not commonly occur at the present day, under the circumstances apparently most favorable for their presence, namely, on an extensive and continuous area with graduated physical conditions. I endeavored to show that the life of each species depends in a more important manner on the presence of other already defined organic forms, than on climate, and, therefore, that the really governing conditions of life do not graduate away quite insensibly like heat or moisture. I endeavored, also, to show that intermediate varieties, from existing in lesser numbers than the forms which they connect, will generally be beaten out and exterminated during the course of further modification and improvement. The main cause, however, of innumerable intermediate links not now occurring everywhere throughout nature, depends on the very process of natural selection through which new varieties continually take the places of and exterminate their parent-forms. But just in proportion as this process of extermination has acted on an enormous scale, so must the number of intermediate varieties, which have formerly existed on the earth, be truly enormous. Why, then, is not every geological formation and every stratum full of such intermediate links? Geology assuredly does not reveal any such finely graduated organic chain; and this, perhaps, is the most obvious and gravest objection which can be urged against my theory. The explanation lies, as I believe, in the extreme imperfection of the geological record.

In the first place, it should always be borne in mind what sort of intermediate forms must, on my theory, have formerly existed. I have found it difficult, when looking at any two species, to avoid picturing to myself forms directly intermediate between them. But this is a wholly false view; we should always look for forms intermediate between each species and a common but unknown progenitor; and the progenitor will generally have differed in some respects to all its modified descendants. To give a simple illustration: the fan-tail and pouter pigeons have both descended from the rock pigeon. If we possessed all the intermediate varieties which have ever existed, we should have an extremely close series between both and the rock pigeon; but we should have no varieties directly intermediate between the fan-tail and pouter; none, for instance, combining a tail somewhat expanded with a crop somewhat enlarged, the characteristic feature of these two breeds. These two breeds, moreover, have become so much modified that, if we had no historical or indirect evidence regarding their origin, it would not have been possible to have determined, from a mere comparison of their structure with that of the rock pigeon, whether they had descended from this species or from some other allied species, such as C. canas.

So with natural species, if we look to forms very distinct, for instance to the horse and tapir, we have no reason to suppose that links ever existed directly intermediate them, but between each and an unknown common parent. The common parent will have had in its whole organization much general resemblance to the tapir and to the horse; but in some points of structure may have differed considerably from both, even perhaps more than they differ from each other. Hence, in all such cases, we should be unable to recognize the present form of any two or more species, even if we closely compared the structure of the parent with that of its modified descendants, unless at the same time we had a nearly perfect chain of the intermediate links.

It is just possible, by my theory, that one of two living forms might have descended from the other; for instance, a horse from a tapir; and in this case direct intermediate links will have existed between them. But such a case would imply that one form had remained for a very long period unaltered, while its descendants had undergone a vast amount of change; and the principle of competition between organism and organism, between child and parent, will render this a very rare event; for in all cases the new and improved forms of life will tend to supplant the old and unimproved forms.

By the theory of natural selection all living species have been connected with the parent species of each genus, by differences not greater than we see between the varieties of the same species at the present day; and these parent species, now generally extinct, have in their turn been similarly connected with more ancient species; and so on backwards, always converging to the common ancestor of each great class. So that the number of intermediate and transitional links, between all living and extinct species, must have been inconceivably great. But assuredly, if this theory be true, such have lived upon this earth.

CONSCIENTIOUS PERSECUTION.

[From Buckle's "History of Civilization in England," Vol. 1, pp. 134-136.

The second illustration is supplied by Spain; a country of which it must be confessed, that in no other have religious feelings exercised such sway over the affairs of men. No other European nation has produced so many ardent and disinterested missionaries, zealous, self denying martyrs, who have cheerfully sacrificed their lives in order to propagate truths which they thought necessary to be known. Nowhere else have the spiritual classes been so long in the ascendant; nowhere else are the people so devout, the churches so crowded, the clergy so numerous. But the sincerity and honesty of purpose by which the Spanish people, taken as a whole, have always been marked, have not only been unable to prevent religious persecution, but have proved the means of encouraging it. If the nation had been more lukewarm, it would have been more tolerant. As it was, the preservation of the faith became the first consideration; and everything being sacrificed to this one object, it naturally happened that zeal begat cruelty, and the soil was prepared in which the Inquisition took root and flourished. The supporters of that barbarous institution were not hypocrites, but enthusiasts. Hypocrites are for the most part too supple to be cruel. For cruelty is a stern and unbending passion; while hypocrisy is a fawning and flexible art, which accommodates itself to human feelings, and flatters the weakness of men in order that it may gain its own ends. In Spain the earnestness of the nation, being concentrated on a single topic, carried everything before it; and hatred of heresy becoming a habit, persecution of heresy was thought a duty. The conscientious energy with which that duty was fulfilled, is seen in the history of the Spanish church. Indeed, that the Inquisitors were remarkable for an undeviating and incorruptible integrity, may be proved in a variety of ways, and from different and independent sources of evidence. This is a question to which I shall hereafter return; but there are two testimonies which I cannot omit, because, from the circumstances attending them they are peculiarly unimpeachable. Llorente, the great historian of the Inquisition, and its bitter enemy, had access to its private papers; and yet, with the fullest means of information, he does not even insinuate a charge against the moral character of the Inquisitors; but while execrating the cruelty of their conduct, he can not deny the purity of their intentions. Thirty years earlier, Townsend, a clergyman of the Church of England, published his valuable work on Spain; and though, as a Protestant and an Englishman, he had every reason to be prejudiced against the infamous system which he describes, he also can bring no charge against those who upheld it; but having occasion to mention its establishment at Barcelona, one of its most important branches, he makes the remarkable admission, that all its members are men of worth, and that most of them are of distinguished humanity.

These facts, startling as they are, form a very small part of that vast mass of evidence which history contains, and which decisively proves the utter inability of moral feelings to diminish religious persecution. The way in which the diminution has been really effected by the mere progress of intellectual attainments, will be pointed out in another part of this volume; when we shall see that the great antagonist of intolerance is not humanity, but knowledge. It is to the diffusion of knowledge, and to that alone, that we owe the comparative cessation of what is unquestionably the greatest evil men have ever inflicted on their own species. For that religious persecution is a greater evil than any other, is apparent, not so much from the enormous and almost incredible number of its known victims, as from the fact that the unknown must be far more numerous, and that history gives no account of those who have been spared in the body, in order that they might suffer in the mind. We hear much of martyrs and confessors—of those who were slain by the sword, or consumed in the fire; but we know little of that still larger number who, by the mere threat of persecution, have been driven into an outward abandonment of their real opinions; and who, thus forced into an apostasy the heart abhors, have passed the remainder of their lives in the practice of a constant and humiliating hypocrisy. It is this which is the curse of religious persecution. For in this way, men being constrained to mask their thoughts, there arises a habit of securing safety by falsehood, and of purchasing impunity with deceit. In this way, fraud becomes a necessary of life; insincerity is made a daily custom; the whole tone of public feeling is vitiated, and the gross amount of vice and of error fearfully increased. Surely, then, we have reason to say, that, compared to this, all other crimes are of small account; and we may well be grateful for that increase of intellectual pursuits which has destroyed an evil that some among us would even now willingly restore.

"VITALS cooked here" is the appalling announcement placarded in the window of a New York eating house. Upon this a wag remarks, "That is probably where the good livers go."

RADICAL CHRISTIANITY.

Rev. Edward C. Towne, who was of Congregationalist birth and education, and has been in the Unitarian pulpit since 1860, publishes the following explanation of the position in which he wishes to stand towards the Christian Church, and of the work he wishes to engage in, as a writer and preacher:—

"In January, 1859, after studying theology in the Yale Divinity School, at New Haven, I printed a little tract to explain the general ground on which I found myself obliged to wholly reject the Bible as an infallible revelation, and Jesus as a Divine Lord and Savior. In the concluding sentence of that explanation I said, 'Christ was a mere man, and the speculative theology which has been taught in his name, and which he partially taught himself, must pass away before the progress of that religion of good-will to men and loyalty to God which he practised.'

"The conclusions to which I thus came, that Jesus was a mere man, and that Christianity, like any other religion, is by no means perfect, and is to be accepted only with free inquiry, and free conviction as to what is its pure truth, and what are its errors, have been confirmed to my own mind by more than ten years of additional study. The belief implied when we say, 'Our Father who art in Heaven,' is the pure creed of Christianity, as the truth was in Jesus. The truth tells us of God Our Father, with His kingdom of moral and spiritual power in us and over us, and of the brotherhood of man, as created by the Fatherhood of God, with our supreme duty of love to man and loyalty to God.

"Very many Christian leaders of the present day virtually deny the divine authority of the Bible and the Divinity of Jesus, but none have ventured openly and boldly to throw these idols out of the temple of true Christian religion, as of no authority to prohibit our direct dependence on the inspiration and providence of God. Yet this is the next inevitable step of Christian progress. We want above all things to-day a Christianity of Christ's truth, separated from that of his errors—a Christianity of the radical principles of love to men and loyalty to God, separated from historical, dogmatic, and ecclesiastical Christianity. The infallible Holy Book and the atoning God-Man, do not belong to pure and undefiled Christian religion. It was error, not truth, which made Jesus a God, and exalted him as the Lord and Saviour of believers, at the cost of denying the true Fatherhood of God and the true brotherhood of man. It was error, also, transmitted from Judaism, which made the Bible a special revelation, at the cost of denying the continued sufficiency of inspiration and providence.

"Fourteen years have passed since I first distinctly and deliberately, as a Christian believer, appealed from the 'Lord Christ' to the God and Father of all souls, from the Messianic pretension in which Jesus was false and wrong, to the precepts and prayers in which he was right and true. And now I propose to devote my life to declare in God's name, as much as strong, well-considered, well-reasoned faith can, that in Christian truth there is no God, or Lord, or Saviour, but 'Our Father,' in whom we all live, and move, and have our being, for human brotherhood on earth and eternal blessedness in heaven, and that the pretension and threat of other divinity, with other aims, in God-Man, or Holy Book, or infallible pope, or exclusive church, are a veritable anti-Christ, even if found on the lips of Jesus, precisely as any other man's errors are veritably antagonistic to what of truth he may embody.

"No Christian sect will tolerate, as yet, a Christian who distinguishes, in the teaching of Jesus and his Apostles, between what seems to faith and reason religious error, and what can be received as really Christian truth. To remove the image of Jesus from the temple of God, even in the most religious and Christian confidence that he was not and that no form or person can be the express image of Deity, is accounted the unpardonable sin by all existing sects. If they no longer kill the body of one guilty of bowing only to the alone supreme and blessed God, they are just as ready as ever to rob him of his character, and to cut off his honest living and his fair opportunity of influence. Hence the necessity under which I find myself of taking an individual and isolated position until by new organization wider lines of Christian communion may be drawn.

"I desire opportunities to speak in a position of Radical Christianity. I should be glad to organize a congregation in Chicago. But I particularly wish to conduct a publication in the interest of Radical Christian views, and I propose to establish such a publication at once, under the title, 'The Examiner;' a Monthly Review of Religious and Humane Questions, and of Literature.' The features of this publication will be: 1. A novel, the modern vehicle of the wide-spread popular instruction; 2. Scholarly and thoughtful essays, on themes of humane and religious interest; 3. Translated articles from French and German sources; 4. Shorter papers and paragraphs of fact, thought and criticism; and 5. A full and accurate account of new books, and of recent and standard books suggested by the new, or by questions engaging the public mind. The contents of No. I. will be in parts, as follows: 'Crazy Chicago; or the Back-Stairs to Fortune—Chapters I.—III.' 'The History of the Devil—his Rise, Greatness and Downfall' (from the Revue des Deux Mondes); 'Who made the Bible?' (Theodore Parker and Christian Fellowship); 'Charles Dickens and his Christian Critics'; 'The Unitarian Situation—Hepworth—Robert Collyer—Mayo—Dr. Bellows'; 'Dr. J. F. Clarke against Theism'; 'The Woman and the Trial,' and other papers.

"I shall go forward with this publication as soon as I can be secure of being able to meet the moderate expense of printing it. The rest is provided for, and I hope to bring out the first number for October, or at least for November. I earnestly appeal to friends and well-wishers of the cause to promptly aid me with subscriptions ($4 for the twelve numbers of one year, each number of not less than 96 closely printed pages), and with pecuniary contributions, in moderate sums, which will be of great service and will be gratefully received. Address Rev. Edward C. Towne, Winnetka, Ill., or 41 Madison street, Chicago."

REPORT FOR 1870.

The REPORT of the Annual Meeting of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870 has been printed in pamphlet form, and is for sale at the price of fifty cents for a single copy; in packages of five or more, thirty cents each. It can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS.; also in Boston at the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield St.; and of Crosby and Damrell, 100 Washington St., in Cincinnati of Bloch & Co., 150 W. Fourth St., in Toledo at the office of THE INDEX. The Report contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, D. A. WASSON, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, F. E. ABBOT, SAMUEL JOHNSON, RABBI I. M. WISE, T. W. HIGGINSON and Wm. H. CHANNING.

A FREE RELIGIOUS EXCURSION.

We lately had the opportunity of being present at the Sunday services of the Free Congregational Society in Florence, Mass. This Society, as also the thriving and pleasant village in which it is situated, may be said to have had its origin in the Community of Socialists that was here organized some thirty years ago. That community as an organized enterprise failed. But some of the leading persons engaged in it remained on the spot and established their private homes. From the active business talent of these has come in great measure the enterprise which has made Florence one of the most prosperous manufacturing villages in New England. And from their reformatory and liberal religious sentiments has sprung the Free Congregational Society. After the Community was broken up, meetings continued to be held on Sunday, in the interest of free thought and free speech on all matters pertaining to religion and social reform. But it was not until the spring of 1863 that any formal organization was adopted. At that time a call was issued signed by "twenty-seven citizens of Florence," inviting all persons "interested in the promotion of good morals, general education and liberal religious sentiments, whether Catholic or Protestant, or of whatever sect, creed or nationality," to meet to organize arrangements for the better attainment of these objects. At this meeting an organization was effected on the following ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

"We the undersigned, inhabitants of Florence and its vicinity in the town of Northampton, wishing to avail ourselves of the advantages of associate effort for our advancement in truth and goodness, and for the promotion of general intelligence, good morals and liberal religious sentiments, do hereby agree to form ourselves into a body corporate under the name of the Free Congregational Society of Florence.

Respecting in each other and in all the right of intellect and conscience to be free, and holding it to be the duty of every one to keep his mind and heart at all times open to receive the truth and follow its guidance, we set up no theological condition of membership and neither demand nor expect uniformity of doctrinal belief; asking only unity of purpose to seek and accept the right and true, and an honest aim and effort to make these the rules of life. And, recognizing the brotherhood of the human race and the equality of human rights, we make no distinction as to the conditions and rights of membership in this Society, on account of sex, or color, or nationality."

On this platform of general principles the Society was organized and legally incorporated. Its officers are a Moderator (or President), Clerk, Treasurer, and four Committees; a general Executive Committee, and Committees on Library and Reading-Room, on Music and on Sunday School. Connected with the Society there is also an association called "The Industrial Re-union," organized by the women of the Society "for social and industrial purposes, in which they have aimed to avoid the evils of sewing societies, and at the same time enlarge the sphere of their usefulness. It is designed to make the organization the means of furnishing profitable work to those who are seeking it, and ultimately render the whole business of the association a source of income."

The Society differs essentially from other religious societies in its relation to its minister, or "resident speaker," as he is termed. He is not "settled" as minister, but is engaged from year to year, and is to occupy the pulpit only two Sundays in each month. The other two Sundays the Executive Committee engage other speakers as they may desire, and the resident speaker is at liberty to make engagements elsewhere. At the same time he is an active and interested member of the Society, and holds office as Librarian. By this method of supplying the platform on Sunday a great variety of thought and talent is presented to the people. Naturally most of the speakers are liberal and radical. But representatives of all sects are cordially invited, and most of the Protestant Evangelical as well as Liberal sects have been represented on the platform. A Catholic priest has even gone so far as to say that he would accept the tendered invitation to speak to the Society if he had an assistant in his own church. The order of service is at the option of each speaker, it only being provided that the choir will open and close the services with singing. And the range of subjects treated by the speakers is very wide. No subject bearing on the well-being of man would be regarded as out of place.

Another meeting for free conference and discussion is held during a part of the year on Thursday evenings. At these meetings it is generally the live topics of the day, pertaining to political, social, or religious reforms, that receive attention. And good thought and speaking upon them are not wanting. The Sunday School we did not see in its best estate, it being an August Sunday, but the children seemed bright and happy. We judged that very little theology of any kind gets taught in it, but that the time is spent mainly in inculcating such virtues as justice, temperance, purity and charity. A good library is owned by the Society, and is free to all citizens as well as to members.

The Society has a commodious suite of apartments, consisting of a pleasant and airy hall for its Sunday services, a smaller hall adjoining, for its meetings for social intercourse and discussion, and a Library room,—the whole donated to its use for a number of years by its generous President, Mr. Samuel L. Hill. The aggregate expenses of the Society are about $2,000 a year, the whole amount being raised by voluntary contribution. Seats are free at all the services.

This Free Society has now been in existence as a corporate body more than seven years, and is evidently a power in the community and the country for miles around. And if liberal religious sentiments, which have here been predominant for a generation, may be judged by their fruits, Florence can bear good testimony to their practical worth. The temperance, purity, good order and high moral tone of the place have become proverbial. The people all seem to be in a thrifty material condition. The Sunday School of the Free Society a few months since had some surplus funds which were to be devoted in charity. But a committee appointed for the purpose were able to find no cases of destitution in the district. They had to go away from home to find objects of charity. The Catholic priest says that the Catholic children of Florence are the best behaved in his parish, and he attributes it to the general morality of the community. An orthodox church has recently been established in the village, and has its own Sunday School. But not a few children of orthodox parents attend the Sunday School of the Free church as well as the other. Evidently the parents have learned that these "liberal," "radical" and "sceptical" people are not morally contaminating. In short the liberal religious sentiments, which have been organized in the Florence Free Congregational Society, appear to have furnished a very good working faith. Here is a community which, for a generation, has had until recently no recognized "Christian church," which has observed none of the so-called ordinances of religion; which has not held to the Bible nor kept "the Sabbath" in any ecclesiastical sense; which has openly sacrificed "sacred usages," and put in their place free thought, free speech, free search for truth and earnest efforts for the social and moral well-being of man. Yet it is a community in which well-disposed people of all faiths now like to establish their homes, because of its material thrift, its good public order, its pure morals and its neighborly toleration and character.

There is a good deal of Free Religion in a book—a most excellent one—which we have just read of George Macdonald, "Robert Falconer." The following sentences would read very harmoniously in the report of the Free Religious Association:—

"God pets no nation, but trains it for the perfect globular life of all nations—of his world—of his universe. As he makes families mingle, to redeem each from its family selfishness, so will he make nations mingle, and love, and correct, and reform and develop each other till the planet world shall go singing through space one harmony to the God of the whole earth. The excellence must vanish from one portion, that it may be diffused through the whole."

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HAVE DECLARED. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

NUMBER 38.

TOLEDO, . . . OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

RELATION OF SPIRITUALISM TO FREE RELIGION.

[Read to the "Society and Progressive Lyceum of Spiritualists and Liberalists," Sunday evening, Sept. 4th, 1870, in Lyceum Hall, Toledo.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN :—

In response to your very courteous invitation, I have the honor to address you this evening on "The Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion." I have chosen this as the subject of my lecture, not only because I think it interesting to ourselves, but also because I think it important at this time to remove, as much as possible, the mists and clouds which hang over it in the public mind. A large and increasing number of persons are looking with interest to discover the relations which subsist between the two movements known by these oft-heard names ; and I thank you for the opportunity which you have given me of stating my views on the subject. I shall speak frankly, as a friend to friends.

If I understand Spiritualism, it is the undoubting affirmation of continued life for the human soul after death, and of actual and frequent intercourse between departed spirits and still living persons. In other words, it is belief in immortality based on the alleged fact of spirit-intercourse. Whoever holds this belief is, I suppose, a Spiritualist; and whoever is devoid of it has, I suppose, no title to that name. What distinguishes Spiritualists from all other believers in immortality is the affirmation of the fact of spirit-intercourse; and while there may be among Spiritualists various "philosophies" or explanations of spirit-intercourse, all Spiritualists unite in affirming it as a proved fact, a truth established beyond question by human experience. This, then, if I mistake not, is the essence of Spiritualism,—namely, the affirmation of spirit-intercourse.

Now Free Religion, taken also in its essence, is humanity's practical endeavor to attain its own highest development in perfect freedom from all enslaving influences. It has thus two sides, one negative, one positive. Its negative side is the determined repudiation of every species of tyranny, whether political, social, or religious. Its positive side is the intensely earnest effort to develop both the individual soul and society at large into the highest possible perfection in all respects. This is the essence of Free Religion,—the effort to become complete, full-grown men and women, independent of all warping or dwarfing or enslaving influences. Is not that something that is perfectly intelligible and simple? Of course, it is still remains to be decided what constitutes complete manhood and womanhood, and also what are the enslaving influences that prevent it; and it is plain that this effort may be more or less intelligent. But surely there is nothing vague or puzzling about the essential idea of Free Religion thus presented.

I will try, however, to apply this idea, so as to show what, in my own opinion, the general ideal of complete manhood and womanhood is, and what the enslaving influences are that now interfere with it.

We must first of all be free. We must break our chains before we can be in a high sense human. What we want is room and opportunity for growth; and the gaining of freedom means the destruction of all that deprives us of it.

Now in this country the battle of Political Freedom is substantially won—for men; but not for women. Free Religion, therefore, demands the absolute equality of women with men before the law, nor will it be satisfied until every human being has a full and fair chance to become all that his or her nature permits.

The battle of Social Freedom is not by any means won, either for men or women. The community is under many masters still. The power of great corporations, of overgrown capital, of political parties, of dominant fashions, and so forth, over the individual soul, is sufficient to cow and to enslave it, even when the law alone would leave it free. But worst of all is the tyranny of that hydra-headed monster, Public Opinion, which intimidates thousands and thousands into the most abject submission to its arbitrary mandates. Free Religion demands that all of these tyrannies shall be abolished, and that society shall learn to respect infinitely more than it does the liberty of the individual.

The battle of Religious Freedom is so far from being won, that vast multitudes, including many who loudly profess to be free, are still loaded with religious shackles. No thoughtful observer can fail to perceive how absolute is the sway of the Christian system over the minds of millions on millions in America, and how it benumbs and paralyzes their mental and spiritual faculties. Free Religion demands that the power of the Church as an institution, of the Bible as an infallible book, of the Christ as a spiritual Lord and Master, shall be broken down forever, and the multitudes they now hold in bondage be set free.

Lastly, the battle of the human soul for Freedom from its own inward tyrants is still to be begun in countless thousands, the world over. The passions that drag down into seemingly hopeless ruin such myriads of our best and noblest,—the consuming vice of intemperance, with its hecatombs of victims, the loathsome “social evil” that ravages the land with such frightful devastation, the greed of gain that secretly rots away the virtue of so many who are looked upon as pillars of society, the inordinate passion for “success” that drowns all remembrance of high principle in the shrewd calculations of a low cunning,—all these, and more, are tyrants that set up their thrones in the heart within, and rule with an iron sceptre that has no parallel without. Free Religion demands that these Bonapartes of the breast, these most insidious of all despots, be hurled from their seats, that great, free, noble character may become a possibility.

Can any one doubt, then, that Free Religion has a war to wage with the same terrible earnestness, the same predestined triumph, with which the legions of Germany have swept away the haughty and conscienceless Empire of France? Freedom, the first condition of growth, must be achieved, before Religion can accomplish its perfect work. Then comes the quick and tender conscience, ruling the outer and inner life,—the indomitable strong intellect resting all convictions of truth on reason and deep feeling, to the forgetfulness of all inflexible authorities, for truth and general good are overflowing with noble sympathies for the weak and the despised of the world, in the fulfilment of high purposes with resistless power. Then comes the Commonwealth of Man, that true brotherhood of the race in which the entire energy of the individual shall be devoted to the public welfare, and the entire energy of society shall be devoted to the welfare of all its individuals. When mankind shall have reached this social state, all men and women can begin to realize at last the true perfection of their nature ; and it is the task of Free Religion to labor patiently and hopefully for the coming of that great day.

I have thus tried to state in plain English what Free Religion is. You will perceive it is not a system of doctrines, but a practical effort to bring our human nature to its full proportions, to the highest attainable degree of development ; and to make this development possible, it demands the destruction of all tyrannies, whether outward or inward. So far as definite doctrines are concerned, it abides in every question of truth by the verdict of human reason and human experience, and rejects every species of authoritative extinguishers of thought. Whatever, after calm and patient and thorough investigation, shall become established as truth, that it will accept without any fear of consequences. It is opposed to nothing but slavery, ignorance, superstition, evil ; and accepts with joy all things true and good.

Having thus defined, as well as I can in such short sketch, what Spiritualism and Free Religion are, we are prepared to take up the question of their true relation to each other.

Now a Spiritualist may, or may not, be a worker for Free Religion ; and a worker for Free Religion may, or may not, be a Spiritualist. That is, a man may believe in spirit-intercourse without caring anything for securing a freer and higher development of humanity. He may accept or reject the infallible authority of the Bible ; he may belong to the Christian Church, or be an " infidel " ; he may be a good or a bad man ; but so long as he believes in the fact of spirit-intercourse, he is a Spiritualist. On the other hand, a man may be an earnest worker for the advancement and emancipation of humanity either with or without believing in the fact of spirit-intercourse. All that Free Religion requires of him is to toil unselfishly for the improvement of society and his own character, and to free himself from the bondage of inward and outward tyrants. You see, then, that a man may be at the same time a Spiritualist and a worker for Free Religion, or he may be one of these without being the other. Consequently, there is no sort of antagonism between Spiritualism and Free Religion, and no sort of necessary connection between them. The reason is that Spiritualism has one great doctrine to believe in, while Free Religion leaves all doctrines to the final verdict of reason and experience insisting only on practical devotion to freedom and the highest interests of humanity.

Looking, however, at Spiritualists as a body, I see that, like every other body professing belief in the same doctrine, they are divided into two great classes or wings, the conservatives and the liberals. The conservative wing remains still attached to the Bible as an authority, and takes its sayings as final, independently of the testimony of reason and experience, or it holds the fact of spirit-intercourse as a dogma, not to be questioned or subjected to further investigation. I must be frank with you,—I do not think that conservative Spiritualists have any sympathy with Free Religion, which always claims the right to examine and re-examine all questions with a reservation in the light of reason and experience. It neither admits dogmas based on the Bible, nor dogmas based on any other authority that cannot be doubted. But the other or liberal wing of the spiritualist body rests the fact of spirit-intercourse on what they believe to be the testimony of reason and experience, and are perfectly willing to test it again and again by the same standard. They neither accept an infallible Bible nor any other infallible authority; and they are as sincerely earnest in their devotion to freedom and human progress as any other class of persons. I regard liberal Spiritualism, therefore, as one form of Free Religion. Liberal Spiritualists, having appealed to reason and experience, are satisfied with the evidences actually offered in favor of spirit-intercourse; while other liberal persons, having made the same appeal, are not satisfied with the same evidences. But both, being equally opposed to all infallible authorities and to all low aims in life, are alike working in the cause of Free Religion. Both accept reason and experience as the ultimate standard of appeal; both reject all infallible and arbitrary standards; both insist on perfect freedom; both seek the highest, purest, and noblest development of humanity. Hence there is nothing essential that separates them; and liberal Spiritualism is in my opinion one form of Free Religion.

Am I wrong in this conclusion? I think not. You feel sure, perfectly sure, of a future life; and I hope most earnestly that you are right. You also are convinced that the spirits of the dead communicate directly with the living, while of this I am by no means convinced. But we both believe (do we not?) that the true object of this life is to become as free, noble, useful men and women as we can,—to devote ourselves to everything that shall benefit society, or raise the tone of private character, or in any way make life on earth what it should be. This is in your opinion the best preparation for the life to come, and it is in my opinion the only worthy use of the life that now is. Very well. If you are right, then I too shall have been fitting myself, although less designedly than you, for a future that will come to us all. Are we not, then, devoted here to the same objects in fact? I cannot see it otherwise. And because this mode of life is that to which Free Religion summons us, I cannot help believing that, with the exception of your one doctrine, the faith by which we live is substantially the same. Sure I am that all minds which are really freed from subservience to despotic masters, and which dedicate themselves to universal rather than private ends, are fellow-soldiers in the same great cause of man. And it has, therefore, been to me no cause of surprise, though a great cause of pleasure, to find so much sympathy in my public work tendered to me by liberal Spiritualists.

Since then, the relation between Free Religion and liberal Spiritualism is so close and friendly,—in fact, that of identity to a very great extent,—it naturally follows that both will favor the same broad and inclusive kind of fellowship. A considerable portion of the Spiritualist body are apparently desirous of forming a fellowship or new denomination on the basis of belief in spirit-intercourse; while another portion, embracing what I regard as the liberal Spiritualists, are opposed to any such movement on the ground of its being narrow and sectarian. I should like to say a few words of sympathy with the latter or liberal wing of your body.

I believe most profoundly in God. Yet nothing could induce me to join a body whose bond of union should be a profession of faith in God. Why not? Because the doctrine of God's existence, if made the basis of an organization, must exclude all persons who do not believe that doctrine; and I will never belong to an organization which excludes any man because of his belief. The doctrine becomes a bar of separation instead of a bond of union; and I cannot in any degree sanction the principle or spirit of dogmatic exclusiveness.

Now if a fellowship of Spiritualists is formed on the basis of spirit-intercourse, the same objection must hold. The doctrine (whether true or false, makes no difference) becomes a fence to keep apart those who would otherwise be drawn together; for I cannot help believing that the simple love of liberty and humanity is a stronger attractive force than any doctrine, and must yet become the basis of every truly liberal organization. It is always the tendency of doctrines, when thus made a bond of union, to create gradually an exclusive spirit very unfavorable to genuine freedom of thought. This is the reason why the Christian church, which began as a little body of believers in Jesus held together by simple love for him, became ultimately the most intolerant organization known in all history, simply because belief in his Messiahship was made the condition of admission. This one dogma gradually developed into the long creeds which have cursed the world with their bitter fruits. It is of no consequence at all whether the doctrine adopted be true or not; it occupies too prominent a place in the attention of its adherents, and gradually crowds out of their sight those great, noble objects which once, perhaps, had the strongest hold on their affections. Even if I were a Spiritualist, therefore, I should join the liberal wing of your body in protesting against the narrow policy of building up a new sect.

The true platform of a liberal organization should be so broad, that no liberal mind could feel itself excluded from its privilege of work. The truth never needs the aid of a dogmatic union; yet what honest person would wish that the powerful influence of organization should be thrown on the side of what is not the truth? For instance, if the doctrine of spirit-intercourse is true, it will surely cause itself to be believed by the world just as fast as the world will be benefited by believing it. All that the truth ever demands is "an open field and no favor;" and this is secured when the basis of organization extends an impartial welcome to all persons, of all beliefs, who may choose to co-operate in the actual objects proposed. This is the kind of fellowship suggested alike by the spirit of Free Religion and by that of liberal Spiritualism; and that it is not only beautiful in theory, but also practicable in fact, has been abundantly proved by experience. The only true platform with which liberals of all shades of thought can be permanently satisfied is that of pure independency, which welcomes theist and atheist, spiritualist and materialist, to its opportunities of free discussion and earnest work for man. In the long run, the truth and the truth alone can be established, when no honest thinker is greeted with obloquy, but heard with respectful and kindly attention. Important as our private beliefs may be, they are all less important than that large, generous spirit which desires no privilege not equally granted to all mankind, and which frankly accords to others exactly the same rights which it demands. This is the spirit of Free Religion, and I see it in so many Spiritualists that I believe liberal Spiritualism to be one of the many forms under which Free Religion appears in the world.

It may not be a matter of much interest to you to know what are my own private opinions respecting spirit-intercourse; yet perhaps it may be well for me to express them frankly in this connection. What will be the ultimate verdict of mankind on this question, I could not without presumption pretend to tell; but it is perhaps due to you that I should not refrain on this occasion from explaining what I believe concerning a point so closely connected with my subject.

The only interest which in my estimation attaches to "spirit-communications" is their bearing on this question of immortality. Intrinsically they seem to me of little or no value. But if they really come to us from a spiritual world all about us, yet hidden from our view, they prove the doctrine which I think no one can wish untrue,—the doctrine that our spiritual life is not extinguished in the grave, but continues when its material form disappears in the eternal round of Nature's metamorphoses. I think that you are right, when you rest your belief on supposed facts, instead of vague intuitions or arbitrary assertions. If the doctrine of immortality is to retain its hold on human belief, it must be shown to have a basis in reality, in facts which can be investigated according to the well-established principles of science. So far as I have had opportunities to investigate (and I have neglected none that I could improve), I have remained unconvinced. To me the fact of spirit-intercourse is still unproved.

It is true, however, that I have seen and heard things I could not explain. Friends whom I trust as implicitly as I trust myself have told me experiences beyond my power to account for. When I am told that I ought therefore to believe in spirits as the cause, there being no other cause alleged,—that these phenomena have been before the public so long that other causes, if existent, must have been discovered,—I can only say that I cannot accept a theory not convincing in itself, simply because it has no rival theory. This is neither a scientific nor a philosophic course. It is, I know, a hard thing for most persons to suspend their judgment; they make haste to accept a faulty explanation, rather than accept none. But until I am perfectly satisfied by the evidence of my own experience that spirits do indeed communicate with the living, I cannot help suspending my judgment. This seems to me the only way by which to protect myself from sheer credulity. Science teaches us to leave many questions open, and trains us not to close them rashly. It seems to me a weakness when people exclaim "yes" or "no" to every question; "I don't know" may be a truer answer. And so I wait till Time shall bring me wisdom.

But I cannot close my lecture without saying one word more. It would be impossible for me not to follow your belief with my hope. And I should be very loth to take it from you. I doubt not it makes radiant many an hour that would otherwise be dark with night. Christianity is often declared to have been a great blessing to mankind, because it has created a strong assurance of immortality in countless minds. But if this be true, Spiritualism should be called a greater blessing still; for it has created an unspeakably more intense conviction of immortality than Christianity creates to-day. It claims to bring the supernatural into the sphere of the natural, and the apparently miraculous within the domain of law. Besides, if Christians cannot believe your thousands of witnesses, testifying to your marvellous stories with eyes and ears, they must be demented to believe their own witnesses, unknown by name or date. Although myself unable to believe in any stories of the kind, I certainly count your case the stronger of the two, and should be far sooner a convert to Spiritualism than to faith in the Christian miracles.

To me, however, the best thing in Spiritualism is not what it sets the greatest value on,—the supposed fact of spirit-intercourse. That for which I most highly honor it is its free, bold, progressive spirit, its cheerfulness, its liberality. For my own part, I am content to wait till the Infinite Love shall make known to me the secrets of the veiled future. But meanwhile I do want to live life nobly, and to see the world of man growing more beautiful day by day. And I rejoice to recognize the great good that Spiritualism has done in the cause of spiritual freedom. I see no reason why it and Free Religion should not at least be cordial friends, combining in all good movements, and speaking to each other words of hearty cheer and mutual encouragement. We all believe that it takes the pure, warm sunlight of liberty to make a man grow up into health and beauty and power; we all long for the good time coming, when justice shall take the place of oppression, and truth the place of superstition, and universal love the place of small bickerings and heart-burnings and hates. Agreeing kindly to differ where we cannot wholly agree, let us remember only the great, noble objects we all have at heart, and try to make this world a little less black with misery and sin before we die.

Miscellaneous.

WHO DESTROYED THE ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY?

[The excellent little liberal sheet published by the National Liberal Reform League, under the name of the Iconoclast, at Washington, D. C., has the following in a recent number.]

Everybody is familiar with the story of the burning of the Alexandrian library by the Saracens; and as it has long been used as a weapon against the Mohammedan religion, we publish the following from the two highest authorities in the world, for the purpose of showing our readers the importance of searching for themselves, instead of taking statements, on the faith of a biased public opinion or a warped current literature. In its article on Alexandria, the Encyclopædia Britannica says:—

"This structure (alluding to the Serapeion) surpassed in beauty and magnificence all others in the world except the Capitol at Rome. Within the verge of this temple was the famous Alexandrian library, . . . containing no fewer than 700,000 volumes.

"As the museum was at first in that quarter of the city called the Brucheion, near the royal palace, the library was placed there likewise; but when it came to contain 400,000 volumes, another library within the Serapeion was erected, by way of supplement to it. In this second library 300,000 volumes in process of time were deposited, making in all 700,000 volumes.

"In the war carried on by Julius Cæsar against the inhabitants of the city, the library in the Brucheion, with all its contents, was reduced to ashes. The library in the Serapeion, however, still remains, and here Cleopatra deposited 200,000 volumes of the Pergamenean library. These and others added from time to time rendered the new library of Alexandria more numerous and considerable than the former, but when the Temple of Serapis was demolished under the archbishopric of Theophilus, A. D. 399, the valuable library was pillaged or destroyed, and twenty years afterwards the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every intelligent spectator."

The same authority, under the article "Amru," further says:—

"To Amru has generally been attributed the burning of the famous Alexandrian library, by command of khaliff Omar; but with this act of barbarism, so repugnant to the character of Omar and his general, he is for the first time charged by Abulpharagius, a Christian writer who lived six centuries later. It is highly probable that few of the 700,000 volumes, collected by the Ptolemies, remained at the time of the Arab conquest, when we consider the various calamities of Alexandria, from the time of Cæsar to those of Caracalla, Diocletian, and the disgraceful pillage of the library, in A. D. 389, under the rule of a Christian Bishop, Theophilus, a far less respectable character than the Arabian conquerors."

We add the following corroborative statement, made by the equally unimpeachable authority, Chambers' Encyclopedia, in its article on the Alexandrian library:—

"The other part of the library was kept in the Serapeion, the temple of Jupiter Serapis, where it remained till the time of Theodosius the Great. When this emperor permitted all the heathen temples in the Roman empire to be destroyed, the magnificent temple of Jupiter Serapis was not spared. A mob of fanatical Christians, led on by Archbishop Theophilus, stormed and destroyed the temple, together, it is most likely, with the greater part of its literary treasures."

"It was at this time that the destruction of the library was begun, and not at the taking of Alexandria by the Calif Omar, 642 A. D. The historian Orosius, who visited the place after the destruction of the temple by the Christians, relates that he saw only the empty shelves of the library."

RECOGNITION OF THE DEAD.—One of the saddest of the European war items is the mode adopted by the Germans for recognizing their dead. Slips of parchment, like baggage labels, are prepared, on which the name and residence of the soldier is written, and it is sewed into his coat, so that when he falls, he is known. This idea, had it been adopted in our war, would have saved the word "Unknown" on long ranges of graves, and the deep grief, not yet quenched or abated, that hovers over many a household, over the unreturning brave who lie in unknown graves. Sadly does a foreign journal comment on this wise German act:—

"After the day is decided, the enemy, if he be master of the field, will be requested to collect and return these labels, of which about a million have been provided. Grim tickets for an unknown journey!—billets pour aller et retour—many and many of which will be 'collected' on the deadly road before the world is a week older, each label being the record of a life freely given for the Rhine. We have signalized the exalting and purifying effects which national warfare exercises, but ah! these little slips of parchment!

"Think of the German wife or mother sewing it on,—the battle ticket of her stake in the quarrel—the address of her particular 'material of war,' the awful travelling label whereon no loving hand may write 'With care,' seeing that its bearer goes into the Valley of the Shadow, to come forth again or not, as Heaven shall decree. Sewn on with German thread, ripped off, perchance, with French knife, whole packets and parcels of these little human memoranda will surely be returned; but yet every man who buttons his coat over the label of death has looked his fate full into the face, and made himself ready for the burial."

—Zion's Herald.

THE PRUSSIAN WAR SYSTEM.—There is little to be said about the Prussians except that their administrative machine works with unbroken regularity, and with a ponderous power which is astounding the civilized world. Men, munitions and stores pour to the front in a never-failing current, and every man finds his place when he gets there, apparently without a jar, and every blow either of the three corps strikes, it strikes with all the force of the first hour. The work which in all other wars has been the work of a year, is literally crammed by the Prussians into a month. They take the whole male population bodily, and without giving even delicate men time to get sick or weary, fling the mass on the enemy, and again and again and again, till he is crushed, and the war is over. This terrible rapidity is one of the essential conditions of the system. Society is waiting paralyzed at home for the army to come back, and it has to win quickly at whatever cost. It is pretty certain, too, that murderous as this system seems, it is the most humane of all. It saves the losses by disease, which in all wars outnumber the losses under fire four to one.—The N. Y. Nation.

SPIRITUAL-MINDEDNESS.—Some persons are possessed of rare powers of concentration, especially on certain occasions. There are professed Christians who weekly assemble at the place where religious worship is wont to be held in our village, and sit under the droppings of the sanctuary from Sabbath to Sabbath, who have such rare powers of religious devotion, and so completely do their minds become abstracted from material things and carnal objects, that they never see the steward when he passes the contribution basket.

It must be a glorious thing to be thus spiritually minded!—Westerville (Ohio) Banner.

Some one says truly that the best way for a man to train up a child in the way it should go is to travel th way sometimes himself.

WAR SONG.

[The following spirited poem by Freiligrath was read by Mr. Guido Marx amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the multitude at the German war-meeting in Toledo, Saturday evening, Sept. 10.]

Hurrah, thou matron, proud and fair!
Hurrah, Germania mine!
With body bent, how bravely there
Thou standest by the Rhine!
How 'neath the blaze of July's fire
Thy ready sword is drawn!
How high of heart, with kindled ire,
Thou leap'st to guard thine own!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

No thought of war was in thy breast;
On spreading field and plain,
In gladness thou in peace and rest
Wast harvesting the grain,
To sickle's ring, with wheat ears crowned,
The sheaves wert bringing home;
When sudden, hark! the war trumps sound;
From o'er the Rhine they come!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

Flung is the sickle in the wheat,
Away is thrown the wreath!
In noble anger to thy feet
Thou leap'st with deep-drawn breath.
Thy hands were clapped exultant then;
Thou wilt, the deed be thine!
Up, children, up! Up, all my men!
On! to the Rhine, the Rhine!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

The Haaf and Belt hoarse answer yield;
The German Sea replies;
Bold Oder rushes to the field;
The Elbe her weapons tries;
Neckar and Weser pour their tide;
The Main comes storming on;
All ancient feud is laid aside;
All Germany is one!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

Suabian and Prussian, hand in hand;
One army South and North!
What is the German Fatherland?
None ask from this day forth.
One body, arm and soul we are;
Have but one will and way!
Hurrah, thou proud Germania!
Hurrah, thou glorious day!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

Let happen now what happen may,
Firm stands Germania!
This is the German natal day;
Woe to thee, Gallia!
Woe that a robber's hand should force
The sword into thine own;
Curse him! For home and country's cause
The German sword is drawn.
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

For wife and child, for home and land,
For all we value most,
Whose guardians we are pledged to stand
From lust of foreign host;
For German faith, for German right,
For German use and want,
To keep our German honor bright,
On to the battle front!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

Up, Germany! God fights for thee!
Up! up! the die is cast!
Our hearts are sore, it well may be,
For blood must flow, and fast;
But boldly up thy glance must soar,
We sure to conquer are!
Great, glorious, free, as ne'er before,
Hurrah, Germania!
Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah,
Hurrah, Germania!

We are indebted to the Tageblatt of Laybach for the account of an edifying miracle which has caused great sensation in that district. An innkeeper of Radendorf (Carniola) having given grave offence to his cure, the latter pronounced an anathema against him, and the impious Boniface was forthwith transformed into an animal which we do not usually regard as a symbol of cleanliness. The relatives of the metamorphosed applied on his behalf to the Bishop of the diocese, and the good man requested the cure to undo his work; but the latter declared that this power was in the hands of the Pope alone. A petition was accordingly dispatched to Rome, and his Holiness deigned to reply, in an autograph letter, that the imporcunato would recover his primitive form, if conducted to the venerable chapel of the Virgin at Brezje, in Carniola. The unfortunate innkeeper has just been conducted by his friends to the holy spot, and the faithful are flocking to Brezje to be present at the new and rectifying miracle. The result is not yet known.—Prot. Churchman.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I respect your position more and more, the more I compare the New Testament with the best results of modern thought. Neither of us stands inside Christianity as it has hitherto been. Still we can not, or at least I cannot, be certain that we are, either of us, outside of Christianity as it is to be. Christianity has been elastic and vigorous to embrace many new views. Until I am sure it can never take in ours, I shall not give up such a comprehensive and expressive title, though I do not emphasize it. More than that, I am satisfied that in preaching as a Unitarian minister I am doing the most consistent thing possible. I am helping the cause of Free Religion in the only way practically open to me. If I were not a Free Religionist, I should not preach at all; but because I am one, I preach wherever I can find a hearing, using every means which I can make subserve my cause. I am sure I am as much in the right as I was when I was an Abolitionist, aye, a Disunionist, and therefore voted the Republican ticket because I knew that a Republican victory would help Abolitionism. I regard Free Religion and Radical Unitarianism as embodying substantially the same principle, though in different forms. I say this only because I respect your position so highly that I wish you to understand mine."

"I am very much interested in the copy of the Report you sent me. Have not read it thoroughly yet; but Frothingham has now fully explained what Free Religion means, and I no longer hesitate to become a member of the Society. I would have joined it twelve months ago, but the name misled me."

The question of 'liberty and necessity' is one that has interested me more than any other. James Martineau told me twenty years ago that it had intensely interested him; and although at that time he could not satisfy himself on the question, yet he believed in so-called 'free agency.'

I should like to try your patience by giving the conclusion that I came to then, but have not time this week. It is one of those difficult metaphysical questions that take time to handle intelligibly; yet it is one of such vast importance that one is never satisfied until some decision is reached."

"Enclosed find P. O. order for $9, for which please send to my address five copies of the 'Report of the Free Religious Association,' ($1.50), and five copies of THE INDEX for one year to the following subscribers. I wish each one of the readers of THE INDEX would take upon himself to obtain five new subscribers. To reduce the terms as much as possible, and as an additional inducement to subscribe, I put the price at the lowest figure, $1.60. This is a hard field to work in, or I should have raised a larger club. Goliath reigns almost undisturbed, and his blind subjects are impervious to light. But the only resource is to keep battering away, and the account in the Independent of plucky Mr. Hatch, of the Free Religious Association, comes like an invigorating tonic."

"I believe in free Religion, I subscribe to no ism, I am called an outcast by some because I cannot agonize enough to receive the gift of the 'Holy Ghost.' Your explanation in the Toledo Blade is sufficient for me to send for a sample copy of THE INDEX. Enclosed please find the requisite amount. If the paper suits, I will try and get all the Methodists, Baptists, &c., that I can to subscribe for it, for they all say they believe in free Religion, 'Salvation's free,' &c."

"Above you have my address, below my name for a bound volume of THE INDEX. I often feast from THE INDEX. I pass them round as opportunity presents itself, hoping others may also find something to suit their palate. I doubt not you are engaged in a good work; the world needs more such workers. May God through his angels, our ministering spirits, raise up more to meet the demand, and guide, guard and protect them for further usefulness for humanity's sake."

"Although I am not a subscriber, I have read every number of THE INDEX with heart-felt pleasure. God speed you in this elevating work! I enjoyed number thirty so much that I want two of my friends to share it with me. Will you please to find enclosed twenty-five cents and send a copy of number thirty to the following addresses, with copies of the 'Fifty Affirmations,' if you can spare them."

"I hope Mr. Collyer will 'come to time' on Mr. Bland's call. But I think he will 'dodge' the issue." [We are happy to state that Mr. Collyer will not "dodge" at all, but promises to reply to Dr. Bland.—Ed.]

THE EARLY FROST.

A flower once grew beside my garden wall
Which I scarce noticed till one day it died;
And as I mused on its untimely fall,
A loving friend my secret tears espied;
"Why weep'st thou for the flower?" "'Twas Hope!"
I said, and sighed.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also, an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We misunderstood the publishers last week in offering a bound volume at that price. We will send the latter with THE INDEX for $3.00.

THE TWO INFALLIBILITIES.

The following, clipped from the Methodist Zion's Herald, of Boston, furnishes a good text for some reflections we have been revolving in our mind since the recent vote of the Ecumenical Council:—

"When the announcement of the proclamation of the Infallibility of the Pope was made at Oakington Camp-meeting, Bro. Inskip proclaimed, as the great antagonist truth to this diabolic lie, the Infallibility of Christ, and declared they would fight it out on that line. The congregation shouted approval, and all arose and sung—

'All hail the power of Jesus' name.'

The effect was grand. The issue will be accepted by the Church."

Yes, that is the real issue henceforth between Catholicism and Protestantism. Neither can dispense with an infallible authority, and the only question is—who shall it be? The infallibility of the Bible, taken as a whole, is not defended to-day even by orthodox scholars of the better class, who have abandoned the theory of "plenary inspiration" now held only by such men as Hengstenberg and Gausen. But the infallibility of Jesus—the absolute truth and divine authority of his religious teachings—is the citadel of Christianity as an historical religion, and is accepted by all who believe him to be the Christ; that is, by all who have an historical right to the Christian name. Even Universalists and Unitarians, with the exception of a "radical" minority who are looked upon with rapidly increasing disfavor in their respective denominations, and who will be eventually "disfellow-shipped" by them, assert the infallibility of Jesus as a revealer of divine truth quite as strenuously as Roman Catholics are now bound to assert that of the Pope.

Let us, then, inquire what is really meant by the dogma of infallibility in these two cases.

Protestant Christians believe that Jesus had means of knowing religious truth possessed by no other man that ever breathed. Those of orthodox belief hold him to have been God himself, and therefore omniscient; while those of more liberal culture, regarding him as a created being, either superhuman or human, either miraculously or naturally born, believe that he was exceptionally inspired with knowledge of such truth, and authorized by God to communicate it to the world. In the former case, Jesus is God speaking directly; in the latter, he is God speaking indirectly through a human mouthpiece. But in both, God himself is the authority, and of course infallible, exempt from all liability to error. This is the belief of all Protestant Christians, except those few liberal minds that have outgrown the substance of Christianity without perceiving it, and therefore without surrendering a name to which they have really no just title. Leaving these out of the account, Protestants all believe in the infallibility of Jesus, without which men could have no absolute assurance of the truths he taught. Their dogma, therefore, resting on an assumed necessity of some infallible revelation, means that the religious teachings of Jesus are the absolute truth guaranteed by God himself. In the words of Dr. Channing,—"The voice of Jesus is the voice of God."

Now Catholics not only accept this fundamental idea of the infallibility of Jesus, but draw from it all its logical implications. They also assume the same necessity of an infallible revelation, and build upon it a consistent dogmatic structure, which the Protestants have destroyed without destroying its foundation. Admitting that Jesus spoke the absolute truth of "faith and morals," they claim that different minds will differ in their comprehension of it, and, if left to themselves, will fall into grievous error in consequence; that the possession of an infallible revelation does not ensure an infallible understanding of it; that the conflicting interpretations of the Protestant sects prove that some of them at least must be in error, and that no one of them can be sure it is not itself in error. If, then, the knowledge of absolute truth is essential to the highest welfare of man (and this the Protestants admit), it follows that the same God who gives the infallible revelation will also give the infallible interpretation of it. In every case of doubt that may arise, he will furnish some means of solving the doubt with absolute certainty, that men may not lose, after all, the benefit of the revelation. Consequently, argue the Catholics, God must have bestowed upon the Church the gift of his perpetual inspiration, which enables it to pronounce on the meaning of this revelation with the same absolute exemption from error with which it was first made. Nor can this logic be evaded. Given the necessity of absolute religious truth to man, and given an infallible revelation of it by the grace of God, it follows irresistibly that the same grace of God will give an infallible interpreter of the revelation itself. Hence arose the dogma that the Church speaks by the Holy Spirit with an infallibility equal to that of Jesus.

But the Catholic logic cannot stop here. The Church is the aggregate of true believers, who are not inspired individually, and cannot logically, therefore, be inspired collectively. The fact of numerous individual minds in the Church itself presents the same difficulty as before, and must find the same solution. The Church itself needs an infallible interpreter. The mere majority vote of a Council composed of men not individually inspired can have no more real infallibility than the majority of a Protestant sect. No number of uninspired votes will make an inspired decree. To be sure, it has hitherto been the Catholic theory that God would inspire the majority to vote right. But this is logically absurd. To do this, he must inspire the individual voters; and what becomes then of the minority who vote wrong? If he inspires a part, why not inspire the whole, and secure a unanimous vote? The only real escape is to hold either that the whole Council will be inspired to vote in the same way, or else that one man of their number will be inspired alone to declare the truth. The former does not happen, even in Ecumenical Councils; therefore, the one man, the Pope, must be held to be divinely inspired to proclaim the absolute truth to the Church.

Now we do not know that this has been the exact reasoning employed by the Jesuits in securing their recent victory at Rome; we give it only as our own deduction from Catholic, nay, from Christian premises. But it seems to us the only logical reasoning from those premises; and it proves to our entire satisfaction that the infallibility of Jesus leads necessarily to the infallibility of the Pope. The reported words of Jesus leave a thousand questions unanswered concerning "faith and morals;" and if absolute certitude on such questions is necessary to human welfare, then we do not see how to escape the Pope's infallibility. To assume that Jesus has spoken infallibly on all essential points, is purely arbitrary,—a mere taking for granted. Truths are all so intimately related, that if one be essential, all should be held to be so. The chief difficulty, however, with the Catholic dogma as it now stands, and one it cannot escape, is this, that an infallible Pope, speaking directly to the Church on the questions of the day, cannot ensure it an infallible comprehension of the truth, unless each believer is inspired infallibly to comprehend it. The truth, that is, must not only be infallibly imparted, but also infallibly received; otherwise the whole scheme fails of its object. Thus the Catholic theory runs into the ground, for it makes the thing infinitely ridiculous to assume that the whole Church is infallibly inspired to understand what the infallible Pope declares.

The root of all this nonsense is the assumed necessity of an infallible revelation of religious truth. Both Catholicism and Protestantism equally assume this necessity, and both are equally absurd in doing so. The only difference is that the one follows out its absurdity logically as far as it can, while the other shirks common sense and logic at the same time. Protestantism, therefore, opposing to the infallibility of the Pope the infallibility of Jesus, protests against the whole in the name of a part,—against the corollary in the name of the very principle from which it inevitably results. The only real escape from the Catholic dogma is to uproot the principle on which both Catholicism and Protestantism equally rest,—the assumed necessity of an infallible revelation. Absolute truth is not for man; he has no need of it, and he does not possess it. Truth is known to us only with the liability of admixture in all cases with more or less error. This is a fact which Free Religion recognizes; and we are content with it as it is. The love of truth is worth more to us than any particular truth; and in cherishing this love, in obeying it, and in making it the rule of life, we shall realize all the "salvation" we covet,—salvation from mean and dishonest and ignoble character.

THE Radical Club of Syracuse, N. Y., is flourishing and actively at work. New names are added to its list of members, the meetings are largely attended, and the publication of Radical Tracts has been undertaken. We have received, as "Tract No. 1," the strong and able article of Mr. James G. Clark on "State Religion and the Bible as a School Book," first published in the New York Independent. This can be obtained at three cents a copy, twenty cents a dozen, or one dollar and twenty-five cents a hundred. Orders by mail to be addressed to the "Radical Club, Syracuse, N. Y." Those who have not read Mr. Clark's article in the Independent will find it admirably adapted for distribution in any place where the Bible-in-Schools question has excited public interest.

"NONE of us yet know what Christianity is. We have the New Testament, but nobody knows what it comprehends."—Liberal Christian for Sept. 3d, first editorial column.

"IF there is anything in the world more completely worn-out, exhausted, stale and threadbare from immeasurable repetition than the objections and criticisms used by those who assail Christianity and endeavor to sustain what they call 'free religion,' it has never come under our notice."—Liberal Christian for Sept. 3d, fourth editorial column.

Perhaps the editor of the Liberal Christian will be better qualified to understand such "objections and criticisms," when he has learned "what Christianity is." We have perceived his ignorance on this subject for some time back, but did not suspect that he himself was aware of it. Henceforth we should credit him with a truly Socratic wisdom, did he not (as above) immediately relapse into the "concert of knowledge without the reality."

The "whirligig of Time" works few such "revenges" as the downfall of Napoleon. Yesterday the first despot of the world,—today a prisoner of war. Surely the cup of his humiliation is full. He drew down on his own head the thunderbolt that has hurled him into the abyss,—loosened with a mad blow of his own hand the avalanche that has crushed him and his "dynasty" forever. Such is the grim irony of Fate!

WE are privately informed that Lee & Shepard, of Boston, will soon publish translations by competent hands of two novels by Madame Marie Sophie Schwartz. They are highly praised by persons who have read them in the original.

A WRITER in the N. Y. Independent has been passing "A Sunday with the Ashes of the Heretics." According to the latest accounts, there were still left a few surviving specimens of the species.

A LETTER FROM MISS COBBE.

BEDDGELERT, N. WALES, July 23.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I have much to thank you for in the copies of THE INDEX you send to me so kindly. I read them always with great interest, and generally with entire satisfaction and sympathy. It seems to me a most hopeful sign of the times that a paper so bravely outspoken and dealing with such profound subjects can find the support which THE INDEX evidently meets, in a country where (we have been wont to imagine) the material labors of life must absorb more attention than in our older world. I only wish there were a paper like it in London!

Among the subjects which I perceive interest your readers is that of our Hindu fellow-theist, Keshub Chunder Sen. I have seen a good deal of him this summer in London, having been in correspondence with him for years; and, I am glad to say, personal acquaintance and some long conversations have fully borne out the very high idea I had formed of him. You may assure all questioners in perfect security that he is as much and as simply a non-Christian theist as you or I. His warm admiration for the character of Jesus Christ is not different in kind or degree from that felt for the Prophet of Nazareth by Theodore Parker, though Keshub's Eastern training, and also his ignorance of the full sense which is given by the orthodox to certain phrases, lead him sometimes to use expressions which I regret, knowing they will be misunderstood. We discussed all our creed one evening together in a very serious conversation, and there was not a single point on which I found any difference between his views and those of Theodore Parker. The extremely devotional character of his mind, joined to a playful, almost boyish temperament, constitute a very charming and original type. I send you herewith a little sketch of his person and work which I have just written at the request of the editor of a popular magazine (Cassell's), which may interest you.

With hearty wishes for the continued success of your excellent paper, believe me, dear sir,
Truly yours,

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

MORAL FREEDOM.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Sept. 5, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—In the leading article of your last INDEX, after showing the cosmos of all things—that the whole phenomena of nature are only a chain of cause and effect managed by God's own wisdom and power—don't you most severely mar this whole arrangement by the following conclusion? "Yet we must be to some extent uncontrolled by fixed laws"!! and you add,—“for to deny it would be the negation of all morals.” I can't see this. For whether your conclusion is true or not, man is just such a being as he is, and we have all agreed in calling certain actions of his moral. The reason of this is, we want a name for different kinds of actions, and moral has been selected as a name for actions of a particular kind. What may be the impelling powers to produce such actions, is another question entirely. When a man is what the world calls sane, and steals his neighbor's horse, the world, believing it was a dangerous love of gain which moved him to do it, calls the action an immoral one. The world is right enough in the name, and it is right in punishing persons who commit such actions; and the punishment is right, whether the offender could or could not, under the circumstances surrounding him, have refrained from doing as he did. If he could have refrained, the punishment is needed, so that next time he would refrain. But if he could not have refrained, still the punishment is needed, so that next time, smarting under the punishment, he could refrain, and others, seeing the punishment, could too. So it appears to me to be entirely proper to call the action a moral or immoral one in either case, and hence there is no "negation of morality." The treatment of offenders needs explaining, and not changing. The world should have more pity and less indignation for its offenders.

EDWARD L. CRANE.

[The essay Mr. Crane refers to nowhere speaks of "the whole phenomena of Nature" as a "chain of cause and effect," and he should be more careful to represent correctly opinions he undertakes to criticise. If he will consider our late editorial on "Freedom or Fate," he will perceive that, if moral actions are to be included under "the whole phenomena of Nature," we do not regard them as forming part of a "chain of cause and effect," but rather as the original activity of a free cause. This position is nowhere departed from in the essay referred to; and Mr. Crane amuses himself with a man of straw. If he desires to grapple the real problem, let him frame an exact definition of the word moral which shall at the same time recognize the facts of conscience, and yet be consistent with the theory that every action is absolutely necessitated. Whoever shall frame such a definition will have done more for philosophy than all the philosophers.—Ed.]

"POOR RICHARD."

SHOUBETOWN, Alleghany Co., Pa.,
September 1, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

DEAR SIR,—I happened to be looking over Webster's dictionary, and came upon an article setting forth Franklin's plan for getting his "Maxims" before the people. I think it a good plan, and should be glad to see Almanacs published filled with subjects that you treat in your paper. I need only refer to page 1588 of the "New Unabridged Dictionary." I am willing to contribute something towards carrying out this plan.

PETER SHOUBE.

[Mr. Shouse writes us that he is above eighty years old; and he is evidently a living refutation of the proverb that "age tends to conservatism." We fear, however, that we should not shine as an almanac-maker, not being on very intimate terms with the "Clerk of the Weather."—Ed.]

A CAUTION.

LAGRANGE, IND., August 12, 1870.

EDITOR INDEX:

DEAR SIR:—As too much praise may produce the effect of flattery (that is, conceit and pride), and as all humanity is to some extent subject to its bad influence, we may injure those we admire by expressing too frequently and too warmly our admiration. Your position is very conspicuous and caution is very necessary. The orthodox are watching with eagle eyes for some place to take hold of, so be cool and cautious.

You may get assistance from abler heads, but hardly from a more ardent wisher for the increase of liberty and the decay of superstition and bigotry. You and I, perhaps, shall not live to see much change, but yet some, I hope. Most men tire at the unreasonably slow progress of ideas. In this busy world, where the mass of mankind have to work and fight for physical existence, the mind is too often forgotten. Man thus becomes a mere animal, at the mercy of the designing few. What an exhibition the past gives of the determined and tenacious love of power and place shown by the priesthood, encouraging ignorance and superstition and using all the ingenuity of fear to control the masses! A hope that the incubus may yet be removed is incentive enough to exertion; but as we stand and look, it seems a mountain, and almost all grow discouraged who aim at its removal.

Should it come convenient, give us some articles showing the attitude of science towards the Bible ideas of God, of the races of men and animals, and of the Physical Universe.

I am glad to see you are dropping off some of those doubtful patent medicine advertisements. I should be glad to have the time come when we could support a liberal paper with its legitimate matter. But work on as you best can; and when you are worn out, some other or others may carry on the work. It ought to and will prosper, if I can judge by the present temper of thinking men, who have become tired of floundering along through the fogs of ignorance perpetuated by ill-read priests: aft.

FALLACY OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

GOD is a natural being, for we know nothing about him but what we derive from nature; and we cannot but compare the origin of things with those things themselves. Nor can a cause ever produce an effect totally at variance with itself. This is human reason, to be sure, but it is derived from experience and observation, the only trustworthy authority that man has yet discovered.

GOD is a spirit; that is, an immanent intellectual power. He is a person, if we consider power, wisdom, intelligence and love the attributes of personality. What does it signify that a spirit has no body cognizable to sense, no corporeal existence that we can apprehend? It is none the less a person on that account. Man's spirit is known only by the effects it produces; and his animal nature does not constitute him a person, any more than an ox or a horse is a person. It is his mental and moral powers only that make him such. Every spirit, for aught we know to the contrary, may have a body of some kind appropriate to its nature. But the eternal and universal spirit is made known to us, and manifested in all the forms of nature, as unmistakably as though it had a corporeal existence. The moral nature of God was eminently manifested in the flesh and person of Jesus, as it is also in every human being that is made in his image and after his likeness. But he is manifested in every animal instinct, in every flower, and in every crystal. Thus he is evidently found in nature, and not out of it, beyond or above it, as the term "supernatural" would imply. And whether Deity is considered a personality, or an elementary force, or a principle of intelligence and power, man and all agents possessing volition are, in a similar sense, just as supernatural as God is.

If God was more than nature, then he would be not only beyond our comprehension, but beyond our apprehension; for what can we apprehend beyond what our own normal faculties can receive? "What can we reason but from what we know?" And we know nothing outside of nature. It is true that our knowledge of many things is obtained only from their effects; but nature is more than an effect. It retains within itself the cause, which cause, and not the effect, is eternal, as God is eternal. To assume that he is supernatural is to presume to know and comprehend all the powers and forces of nature; else how can we decide that nature does not comprise God? Our knowledge of nature is very limited, and we cannot comprehend even the meanest of its works—not even the construction of a grain of sand, or the primal germ-cell of organized life, to say nothing of thought and spirit, which are also things of nature and of law. How, then, dare we to locate the principle that causes them to be, beyond rather than in them? Reason scouts such an assumption. It is faith without fact, and is idle and puerile. God is law; he is principle, wisdom, love, truth. But these are the physical and moral forces of nature, as well as the attributes of God; and, if his attributes are natural, he himself cannot be supernatural.

Not presuming to know anything of the cause of the first cause, or of the eternity of atoms, we are content to know, "that everything that man makes is a thought first," and, analogically, that everything in nature was a thought first. That is, that the spiritual precedes all material forms. Knowing this, we contend with no one about the eternity of matter or of mind, or of the origin of one or the other. From this fact that thought or spirit is necessarily the preceding fact in nature, many argue that spirit is something superior to nature, and thus forget that it is the very beginning and constituent part of everything that has form or substance. For thought, spirit, and intelligence are as really natural forces as heat, magnetism and electricity; and whether they exist in the person of man or in the person of God, they are alike within the sphere of nature.

SAN JOSE, Cal., Aug. 23, 1870.

[We desire to express our especial gratitude to Mr. Thomson for the clear, beautiful handwriting in which he took pains to clothe his thoughts,—all the more because we have so few opportunities for indulging ourselves in the luxury of such a sentiment for such a cause. It would save us a very large part of the drudgery of our editorial duties, if all our correspondents were equally careful and considerate in this matter. Good paper, good ink, good penmanship,—the absence of these will account for the non-publication of several otherwise good contributions we have received. Our time is too precious to be flung away in copying the illegible scrawls of careless correspondents.—ED.]

THE ATOMIC CONTROVERSY.

[From "Nature" for Nov. 4, 1869.]

It is one of the most remarkable circumstances in the history of men, that they should in all times have sought the solution of human problems in the heavens rather than upon the earth. Sixty years ago, a memorable instance of this truth occurred when Dalton borrowed from the stars an explanation of the fundamental phenomena of chemical combination. Carbon and oxygen unite in a certain proportion to form "carbonic acid," and this proportion is found to be invariable, no matter from what source the compound may have been prepared. But carbon and oxygen form one other combination, namely, "carbonic oxide"—the gas whose delicate blue flame we often see in our fires. Carbonic oxide may be obtained from many sources; but, like carbonic acid, its composition is always exactly the same. These two bodies, then, illustrate the law of Definite Proportions. But Dalton went a step farther. He found that, for the same weight of carbon, the amount of oxygen in "carbonic acid" was double that which exists in carbonic oxide. Several similar instances were found by two elements forming compounds in which, while the weight of the one remained constant, the other doubled, trebled, or quadrupled itself. Hence the law of Multiple Proportions. The question was—in fact, the question is—how to account for these laws. Dalton soon persuaded himself that matter was made up of very small particles or minima nature, not by any possibility to be reduced to a smaller magnitude. Matter could not be divisible without limit; there must be a barrier somewhere. No doubt, as a chemist, he would have rejected the famous couplet—

Big fleas have little fleas, upon their backs, to bite 'em;
And little fleas have smaller fleas, and so ad infinitum.

"Let the divisions be ever so minute," he said, "the number of particles must be finite; just as in a given space of the universe the number of stars and planets cannot be infinite. We might as well attempt to introduce a new planet into the solar system, or to annihilate one already in existence, as to create or destroy a particle of hydrogen." All substances, then, are composed of atoms; and these attract each other, but at the same time keep their distance, just as is the case with the heavenly bodies. The atoms of one compound do not resemble those of another in weight or size, or mutually gravitating power. But as they are indivisible, it is between them that we must conceive all chemical action to take place; and an atom of any particular kind must always have the same weight. The atom of carbon weighs five; the atom of oxygen weighs seven. Carbonic oxide, containing one of each must therefore be invariably constituted of five carbon and seven oxygen; carbonic acid must in like manner contain five carbon and fourteen oxygen. Here, then, Dalton not only states that he has accounted for the two laws we have mentioned by making a single assumption; but he evidently intends his theory to be used as a criterion or control in all future analytical results, and already views it as the birth-place of chemical enterprise.

Such, and so great, was the atomic theory of Dalton, founded, certainly, on erroneous numbers, but containing in itself the germ of their correction; aspiring to the command in innumerable conquests; and setting itself for the rise or fall of the chemical spirit.

It is hardly necessary to make any detailed reviews of the history of the atomic theory. Berzelius made it a starting point for researches which, on the whole, have been unsurpassed in their practical importance, and engrafted upon it his celebrated electrical doctrine. Davy and Faraday refused to admit it; Laurent and Gerhardt accepted it doubtfully, or in a much modified form. Henry declared that it did not rest on an inductive basis. There can be no doubt, however, that the atomic theory has been accepted by the majority of chemists, as may be seen on even a cursory inspection of the current literature of their science. Our present intention is to give such a summary of the atomic question as may be serviceable to those who take an interest in the discussion at the Chemical Society on Thursday last.

The modern supporters of the atomic theory agree with Dalton in the fundamental supposition we have given above; but assert that they have a much stronger case. The phenomena of gaseous combination and specific heat have indeed changed the numerical aspect of the theory, but not its substance. The simplicity of all the results we have accumulated with respect to combining proportions is itself a great argument for the existence of atoms. They all, for example, have the same capacity for heat; they all, when in the gaseous state, have a volume which is an even multiple of that of one part by weight of hydrogen. But bodies in the free or uncombined state—such, in fact, as we see them—more commonly consist of many clusters of atoms (molecules) than of simple atoms. These molecules are determined by the fact that, when in the gaseous state, they all have the same volume. Again, select a series of chemical equations, in which water is formed; and eliminate between them so as to obtain the smallest proportion of water, taking part in the transformations they represent. It will be found that the number is eighteen; which necessarily involves the supposition that the oxygen (sixteen) in water (eighteen) is an indivisible quantity. To put this last point another way; hydrochloric acid, if treated with soda, no matter in what amount, only forms one compound (common salt). Now we know the action in this case consists in the exchange of hydrogen for sodium. But if hydrogen were infinitely divisible, we ought to be able to effect an inexhaustible number of such changes, and produce an interminable variety of compounds of hydrogen, sodium and chlorine; hydrochloric acid being the limit on one side, and common salt (sodic chloride) terminating the other. No such phenomenon occurs; and, since the matter must be infinitely or finitely divisible, and has been thus proved not to be the former, it must be the latter. Atoms, therefore, really exist; and chemical combination is inconsistent with any other supposition. Those who hold the contrary opinion are bound to produce an alternative theory, which shall explain the facts in some better way.

Now let us hear the plaintiff in reply.

The atomic theory has undoubtedly been of great service to science, since the laws of definite and multiple proportions would probably not have received the attention they deserve, but for being stated in terms of that theory. Yet we must discriminate between these laws, which are the simple expression of experimental facts, and the assumption of atoms, which preceded them historically, and therefore has no necessary connection with them. For it was the Greek atomic theory which Dalton revived. Nor has any substance yet been produced by the atomists, which we cannot find means to divide. If, moreover, we have no other alternative but to admit the infinite divisibility of matter, even that is consistent with the simple ratios in which bodies combine; for two or more infinities may have a finite ratio. Therefore, the observed simplicity, if used as an argument, cuts both ways. Possibly we are mistaken in connecting the ideas of matter and division at all; at any rate, the connection has never been justified by the opposite side. Again, admitting the argument based on the formation of common salt, the atomic theory does not tell us why only one third of the hydrogen in most organic substances can be so exchanged. Yet the explanation of the one fact, when discovered, will evidently include that of the other. On the whole, it appears that the atomic theory demands from us a belief in the existence of a limit to division. No such limit has been exhibited to our senses; and the facts themselves do not raise the idea of a limit, which Dalton really borrowed from philosophy. The apparent simplicity of chemical union we do not profess to explain, but to be waiting for an experimental interpretation that may arise. The atomists, in bringing forward their theory, are bound to establish it, and with them lies the onus probandi.

The above are a few broad outlines of the existing aspect of the atomic controversy, and may somewhat assist in forming an estimate of it. The general theoretical tone of the discussion last Thursday must have surprised most who were present. Our opinion is necessarily an impartial one; but it will probably be agreed that between the contending parties there is a gulf, deeper and wider than at first appears, and perhaps unprovided with a bridge.

Ill-fortune never crushed that man whom good fortune deceived not.

DEATHS FROM WILD BEASTS IN INDIA.

[From Allen's Indian Mail.]

It has been reckoned that at least ten thousand people die every year in India of snake-bites. The new plan of injecting ammonia into the wounds may tend to diminish the number of deaths from snake-bites, if it succeeds in India as well as it has in Australia; but the havoc caused by tigers, leopards, and other wild beasts, if not greater in fact than it was some years ago, has at any rate been serious enough to draw from Lord Mayo a demand for help on the part of the local governments in devising measures to abate the evil.

Man-eating tigers are the special terror of the country-side. The taste for human flesh either grows with indulgence, or becomes a last resource of tigers of advanced age, whose energies are no longer equal to the demands of their appetite. We had always imagined that the latter was the true way of accounting for the ravages of the "man-eating" class and the mangy appearance for which they are remarkable. It is certainly a curious fact that the tigers in the Oudh jungle seldom prey on man, being plentifully supplied with wild pig and other large game. There, too, they are such cowards that herdsmen armed with lathies, or iron-bound sticks, often drive them away from their own cattle. A driver of a milk-cart will also scare them away by merely sounding his bugle. Elsewhere, however, they are either bolder or have less choice of food. In the central provinces it is a thing of yearly occurrence to hear that a man-eater has posted himself near some district thoroughfare, whence he falls on unwary travellers and toiling peasants, until, emboldened by practice, he even carries off his prey from within the village inclosures. In the Chanda district alone one of these brutes killed, in a short time, 127 people, and stopped all traffic for many weeks on the road from Mool to Chanda. A tigress in Chindwarrah slew, according to native estimates, 150 people in three years, causing the abandonment of the villages, and throwing 250 square miles out of cultivation. Another old tigress in Kurnool carried off sixty-four human beings within nine months, stopped the post-runners and police patrols, and scared away the laborers employed on public works. One of her victims was the head constable. The brute's average allowance seems to have been one man every three days. It was only by keeping together in numbers and making a horrible noise with "tom-toms" that travellers could safely pass that way. At last a broad strip of jungle was cleared away from either side the road, and in due time the beast was hunted down.

In the Bhagalpore district alone of Lower Bengal, as many as 1,434 people were killed by wild beasts in six years. During the same period 13,401 deaths from wild beasts were reported from Bengal Proper, of which 4,218 are ascribed to tigers, 1,407 to leopards, 4,287 to wolves, 174 to hyænas, and 105 to bears, the balance being set down to boars, jackals, buffaloes, elephants and mad dogs. On the other hand, it cost the Government £6,500 in rewards to secure the destruction in the same time of 18,196 wild beasts, of whom 7,278 were tigers, 5,693 leopards, 1,671 bears, and 1,339 wolves. In one year the loss of human life in the Central Provinces amounted to 506, many of whom were children; while 518 tigers, 895 panthers and leopards, 534 bears, 467 wolves, and 475 hyænas were put to death. The wolves of Oudh in the same year killed 5 men, 2 women, 72 boys, and 80 girls. Each of the other provinces adds its quota to the butcher's bill. Of the number of cattle slain, and of the loss entailed on their poor owners, no regular estimate can be formed; but one man alone in South Canara complained of having lost 50 head of cattle through wild beasts; Captain Rogers tells of a tiger who killed half a dozen in a few minutes, and it is well known that thousands of villagers are continually reduced to utter poverty, followed by a long term of bondage to money-lenders, through the ravages of these unpleasant neighbors. The very spread of cultivation tends to increase the suffering by their neighborhood. In the Neigherries, for instance, the clearing away of jungle for coffee plantations drives the wild animals to seek their prey from the villages at the foot of the hills. On the other hand, the planting of new and the conservation of old forests may afford new haunts or new means of living to the beasts of prey. Superstition also plays no small part in the maintenance of these intolerable scourges. The Gonds, for instance, instead of mustering in force to hunt down the tigers who wage war against them and their herds, have an idiotic way of regarding the tiger as a divinity whose wrath it is unsafe to arouse. If one of them falls a prey to the divinity's appetite for human flesh, the rest of the family are forthwith tabooed as displeasing to the object of their reverent dread, and must expiate their offence by costly sacrifices which may leave them penniless, but will restore them to their caste rights.

The head money granted by Governments, to the tune of £15,000 a year, tends, no doubt, to keep the nuisance of wild beasts in some check. As much as a hundred pounds has been given for the head of a man-eating tiger. But the rewards are sometimes granted on very slight evidence, for it is well known that a cunning native will bring up an old head for a new one, or sew a tiger's skin over the head of some smaller animal, and thus cheat a credulous or careless official into passing an unfounded claim. Perhaps the present scale of rewards would bear amending, if, as we understand, much too little is offered for the cubs in comparison with full-grown tigers. The quickest way of extirpating the brutes would be to encourage the destruction of young animals by a larger bounty for their heads. Sportsmen naturally shrink from attacking these scourges with other than the sportman's usual weapons; but even Capt. Roger in his report avows himself a thorough convert to the use of traps and other wiles against foes so widely destructive.

THE CHINESE AT NORTH ADAMS.

In the last number of THE INDEX we gave some account of the Free Church at Florence, Mass. It seemed a very natural extension of our journey to go from that free and tolerant community to the little colony of Chinese Buddhists at North Adams. We wanted to see that first influx of "barbarians" into Massachusetts for ourself. The way thither carried us over Hoosac mountain; and when we had the succession of enchanting views which that mountain ride commands, we thanked fortune that the famous tunnel, whatever may happen to it in the future, was not yet completed, and that we had to go over the mountain rather than through it.

Soon after reaching North Adams, we sought the "Chinese quarter." At present this is confined to the factory and grounds where the Chinamen are employed. A portion of the large brick building is given up to them for their domicile; and the two or three acres of pleasant grounds surrounding the building serve them for gardening and for recreation. They are permitted, of course, to go out as freely as any workmen, but they choose for the most part to stay within the fences of their establishment. They still fear, and not without some reason, that they may suffer insult, if not worse injury, should they stray far away from their home. The Crispins do not acquiesce in the "situation" yet; and some of them, we were told, were ready to commit any outrage upon the Chinamen, if a convenient opportunity should present. The citizens generally, however, seem disposed to treat the new comers kindly, and in the day-time the Chinese go freely and alone to the stores of the village, and on Sundays venture out in groups for longer walks.

It was after the work of the day was finished when we went to the shoe factory. But this gave us an opportunity all the better for noting the natural characteristics of this new class of laborers. The larger portion of them were out in the yard. Some were collected in little groups chatting together. Others were sauntering off singly in a contemplative sort of mood. A few were hoeing in the garden, in which they show a good deal of skill. One or two were smoking, though in a very mild way. And some fifteen or twenty were playing ball; and from the sounds of merriment that came from their direction, they were evidently enjoying the sport hugely. In company with other curious lookers-on we entered the grounds to have a nearer view. There was not much system about the game of ball. It seemed to be more a general frolic with the ball, any one catching it who could, and throwing it again, than a game with fixed rules. There was no such earnest work about it as in an American game of ball, no such striving for some definite end, but it was all frolic and fun. The players were not only playing ball, but they were playful with one another; and the most trifling incidents of humor were sufficient to call forth shouts of laughter. They seemed like children, overflowing with glee, and having a good time on very small resources. The characteristic, indeed, that first impressed us in all these people that we saw there, whatever they were doing, was their air of joyous contentment. It was more than satisfaction or serenity; it was the child's delightedness with the thing in hand. And we were told that when at work they show the same playful good humor; are not silent as American workmen are apt to be, but are always chatting and laughing, as if their work were play too. Another noteworthy feature in this playful scene was the absence of the roughness, scuffling, mock-quarrelling, and manoeuvring for personal advantage, that are so indigenous to a crowd of American boys and young men. They were hilarious and even boisterous, but at the same time showed the utmost courtesy, gentleness, and good temper. And we were assured by Mr. Sampson, the proprietor of the factory, in an interview the next day, that they are uniformly kind, docile, and peaceable, causing no trouble in the management of the establishment. This little incident may serve to show their peaceable nature. In our group of spectators were three or four persons who had been there frequently,—among them an American boy, who, Yankee-fashion, liked to tease the China boys; and so, in fun, he was seizing his opportunity for jerking their queues, pulling their baggy trowsers, and so forth. But the China boys took it all in good part, and only laughed at the annoyance. An older American in the group, who had also become familiar with their ways, tried to stir them up to retaliate on this "young American." "No, no, he only funning," was their reply in pigeon English. "He fool," said the American. "No, no; he good man," said the Chinamen. And the American told us that he had tried repeatedly to make them say of any one who annoyed them in that way, that he was a "fool," but they wouldn't say it. The reply always came, "No, no; he good man!"

The greater part of the seventy-five who make the colony are young men—boys in fact, between fourteen and twenty years of age. They differ greatly in color and feature. Most of them have the peculiar physical characteristics of the Mongolian stock, though in different degrees. But a few, if dressed as Europeans or Americans, might easily pass for Italians or Cubans. A tendency appears among them already to conform their dress to the prevalent fashion in their new home. The older ones keep pretty strictly to the Chinese fashion. But the younger are evidently shortening their gowns and taking reefs in their trousers. Their head man, who is interpreter, commissary and general caretaker of the colony, dresses like an American. His head is no longer shaved, and the growing hair almost conceals his queue, which is coiled up under his hat. This man, who appears about twenty-five years old, interested us greatly. He has lived in California several years; speaks and reads English well; is very intelligent, energetic, and courteous; of fine physique and attractive manners. He seemed as refined a gentleman as any on the ground; and for social and domestic companionship we should have chosen him in preference to some of the American foremen (his equals in business position) who stood there with us. We regret that we did not have more opportunity for conversation with him.

It was not our intention "to interview" Mr. Sampson, the inaugurator of this experiment of Chinese labor in New England, for we knew how much he had been bored by newspaper men and other curious travellers. But we met him at the hotel, and were introduced to him before we fairly understood who he was. We had heard it intimated outside that the Chinamen were not working as he anticipated, and that he had had enough of the experiment. He said, however, emphatically that though he considered it still an experiment, he was entirely satisfied thus far. He laughed at the idea of his Chinese workmen being in a state of serfdom. They were as free, he said, as any laborers in the town, and the contract with them was nothing different in nature from what business men are making with free laborers every day. To the question whether they kept up any of their native religious habits, his reply was, "Nothing outwardly; their religion is inside" And he appeared to think that they would not very readily change this "inside religion," notwithstanding that the Methodists and Baptists in the town have taken their theological education in hand.

We could not help wondering, as we regarded these meek, forbearing, and gentle people, how, if these are a fair sample of the Chinese nation, such an indescribably shocking massacre as that at Tien-Tsin was possible. But the wonder somewhat ceased when we remembered with what reverence for their own civilization and religion, and with what horror of the barbarism of other countries, the Chinese have been for centuries educated, and when we tried to imagine what sentiments of aversion and resistance might be stirred up in Christian America, if Chinese missionaries were to come here, and, using all the arts and intrigues that are common to the Jesuits, should set themselves aggressively to work to convert the American people to Buddhism. We believe that when the secret causes of that massacre shall be unveiled, it will be found that priestly craft on both sides was at the bottom of it. What is wanted for remedy and protection against such horrors is not aggressive attempts at conversion from either side, but a free, generous and enlightened comparison of the two religions, to the end of cultivating and saving what is good in both; and let the old Buddhistic maxim be taken as a motto by both parties,—"Honor your own faith, and do not slander that of others."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD.

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Face, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 23d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

GEO. SHARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.,
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 23d, 1869.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania,
I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.
Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used.

Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HAVE DECLARED. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is NOT responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

WAR AND FREE RELIGION.

[A free lecture read in White's Hall, Toledo, Sunday evening, Sept. 11, 1870.]

FAITH IN MAN PUT INTO PRACTICE,—that is Free Religion. It demands the free growth and full expansion of all his powers, and the devotion of them to the highest objects. Both in the individual and the race, it trusts human nature in its wholeness, and, instead of despising any of its faculties or tendencies, seeks to put them all to their own proper work. If this is done, it becomes plain that there is not a single power or instinct of human nature which could be spared without great loss; and it is the chief aim of Free Religion to secure the natural employment of all such powers and instincts, by which alone the individual can attain the noblest possible character, and society at large the highest possible state. Just as the full-grown oak is simply a developed acorn, so is the hero or the saint simply a developed child.

Now this conception is precisely the reverse of the Christian conception. Systematized Christianity is neither more nor less than despair of human nature. It teaches that man's nature, in consequence of the "fall," has become so rotten and corrupt as to fit him only for damnation,—for the companionship of fiends. His only escape from this justly deserved fate is to have his entire nature made over again,—totally reconstructed from top to bottom by the grace of God. This is the doctrine of "regeneration" or the "second birth," which is set forth in Christian pulpits as the only key to salvation. It is plain at a glance, therefore, that the chasm between Christianity and Free Religion is vast and bridgeless. The one demands the destruction of human nature as it is, and its total reconstruction by the supernatural power of God; the other demands the development of human nature as it now is, in strict accordance with natural laws. The one wants a "new creature" in place of man as he is born; the other takes man as he is born, and wants to make the best of him. It is clear, therefore, that Christian theology and Free Religion are to each other as black and white. Christianity is for crushing out human nature,—Free Religion is for developing it; and there can be no reconciliation between the two.

But in advocating the natural development of human nature, I would not be misunderstood to advocate the wild indulgence of every impulse or passion. It is a fashion with those who have not brains enough to invent a better argument, to charge Free Religion with tending to "free love" and all other kinds of lawlessness. The truth of the matter is this. Among the various instincts and faculties of human nature, there is a natural distinction of higher and lower which Free Religion is the very last to ignore or forget. The animal instincts are at the bottom of the scale, while conscience and reason are at the top. It is the true idea of development to preserve most sacredly this natural supremacy of the moral and intellectual over the merely animal. If there is one characteristic of Free Religion more marked than any other, it is the emphasis it lays upon self-government according to ideas. Justice, truth, freedom, equal rights, benevolence, love, integrity, purity, self-respect,—these are its laws of life; and its one chief aim is to conform the private and public life of humanity to these divine laws in all places and at all times. It is in the light of these great principles that I propose to-night to explain to you what I believe Free Religion teaches concerning war in general, and more particularly what it teaches concerning the great European war which is now riveting the eyes of the whole world.

Now I recognize as an integral part of human nature the combative or destructive instinct. It is at bottom the instinct of self-preservation, without which all life would soon cease upon the globe. This instinct of self-preservation prompts us to shun all danger when we can, and to repel it by force if we cannot shun it. No matter what the danger may be, it is right and proper that we should seek to preserve our own existence,—peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must. Self-preservation is not, it is true, the "first law of nature," as is often claimed; but it is, nevertheless, a law of nature, which should be obeyed unless superseded by a still higher law. The combative instinct, therefore, or the instinct of battle, has its proper place among the various impulses of human nature; and, instead of being branded as wicked, it should be recognized as of vital importance to human welfare. When Christianity teaches the doctrine of non-resistance, as I think it clearly does, and enjoins submission to the aggressor, it violates a law of nature, and can secure only a very limited amount of obedience. Jesus clearly taught the duty of non-resistance, and the Quakers consistently accept it; but the vast majority of Christians escape it by some convenient trick of exegesis, and are no more inclined to peace under assault than are the rest of mankind. This labored disobedience to a very plain principle of the Christian gospel, practised by the vast majority of its believers, simply shows that Christianity is at odds with human nature on this point, and therefore inevitably fails.

There is, however, a true and proper function for the combative instinct,—namely, that of self-defence or resistance against attack; and it has the sanction of Free Religion. Both the individual and the nation have an unquestionable right to defend their own existence. If either perverts the natural impulse of battle to the service of selfish aggrandizement, and assumes the offensive, it thereby confers on the party assailed the right of resistance; and in every case the aggressor is wrong, while the defender is right. It follows that no war can be, right on both sides, and may not be right on either side. But it may, at least, be laid down as a true principle, that wars of pure aggression are always unjust, while wars of pure self-defence are always just.

To this principle I know no exception. To be sure, the attacking party may be so enormously superior in military power as to make successful resistance impossible; and the party attacked may, in this case, prefer submission to extinction. But this is simply to waive a right. If it prefers extinction to submission, it is entitled to the admiration which cannot be withheld from heroic self-sacrifice. He is a rash man who would, on simple grounds of expediency, venture to condemn as wrong the man or the nation that chooses death rather than slavery. The party attacked has always the right to defend itself, if it chooses to do so; while the party attacking has no right at all on its side.

In deciding which is the attacked, and which the attacking party, it is not always, though it is usually, the party which actually strikes the first blow; this is no absolute criterion in the matter. The attacked party is really that whose existence is causelessly assailed; and its justification is not lost, if it anticipates the coming blow. In the great majority of cases, however, wars have been at their commencement unjustifiable on either side; and it is only when the war has become, by the course of events, a pure struggle for existence on one side or the other, that an appeal can be made to the sympathy of mankind. This possibility of a change in the character of a war cannot be left out of sight; for if the successful defender becomes in turn the aggressor, it becomes a new war for a new cause, and must be newly judged. The principle that wars of self-defence are right cannot change, but will in every case justify the party that battles solely for its own existence.

When, consequently, Peace Societies make their appeal for the suppression of war on the ground that war is wholly wrong, without recognizing at all the right of the party attacked to defend itself, I am quite unable to respond. I shall occupy no time to-night in proving that war is an evil, for words cannot begin to depict the horror and terribleness of an evil so gigantic. The whole civilized world is of one mind on this subject, and has learned by experience that the misery and devastations of war are incalculable. But just so long as aggression continues, war must continue; and the only way to abolish war is to abolish its cause. Teach men and nations to refrain from aggression, and the work is done. I see no radical cure for this stupendous evil of war except in the destruction of its causes; and I would fain concentrate my efforts, however feeble, in this one direction. When monarchies have everywhere given place to republics,—when great standing armies are everywhere disbanded,—when the lust of conquest yields to the peaceful emulation of commerce and home development,—when men are sufficiently educated to despise that passion for "glory" which has been the bane of humanity for thousands of years,—when the sentiment of human brotherhood has become so universally diffused as to bind all nations into one common family,—when respect for equal rights has become so deeply rooted in human hearts that to do an unjust act is more disgraceful than to suffer it,—in a word, when the spirit of Free Religion shall embrace the globe like an all-encompassing and life-giving atmosphere, then, and not before, will war be done away by the cessation of all aggression of nation on nation and man on man.

So far, therefore, as Peace Societies work for these objects, I sympathize with them most deeply; but I want to see them recognize the fact that, until aggression ceases, war cannot cease, and ought not to cease. I cannot forget the supervening good that comes after a war waged in a just cause; I cannot forget that the combative instinct is a part of human nature, to be respected and guided by the higher faculties; I cannot forget that life itself is not our chief good, but ought cheerfully to be sacrificed for liberty and justice and the great cause of man. And while I remember these things, I cannot hold war, hateful and horrible and sickening as it is, to be the worst of all evils. There are evils even worse,—the decay of the love of freedom and country and humanity; the cowardly cleaving to life and ease as above all other good; the besotted self-surrender to material prosperity when a great cause demands its sacrifice; the forgetfulness of the claims of the country on her children and of the race on the individual. Even out of the blood and havoc and wide-wasting flames of war there arises to a brave people, fighting for liberty and justice, a compensation for all their anguish in the revival of patriotic devotion and the consecration of the universal heart to that which is grander than private interests. This is a part of the reward for battling in a good cause; and I should have to shut my eyes to plain facts and great principles, if I were to brand all wars as unholy and unjust.

In the light of such ideas as these, I feel called upon to examine the conflict now going on in Europe, and to state my conclusions without partiality and without prejudice.

The cause of the war, or at least its impudent and empty pretext, is well known to the world. Louis Napoleon, stung with jealousy at the invitation extended by Spain to Prince Leopold to occupy the vacant Spanish throne, demanded of Prussia a solemn pledge not only that this invitation should be refused, but also that no prince of the house of Hohenzollern should ever be allowed to accept a similar invitation. To this haughty and insolent demand, King William returned a dignified refusal, having previously required Prince Leopold to decline the Spanish offer. On this, Napoleon declared war, unprovoked, causeless, and aggressive war, against Prussia, who had no choice but to fight in self-defence. This is the story in a nut-shell. But the real object of Napoleon was doubtless to crush the power of Prussia, undo the work it had done towards the unification of Germany, and reconquer the Rhine provinces. It was a war of the French Empire against the German people,—a war which had not the ghost of a cause beyond the boundless ambition and domineering pride of the French Emperor. It was thus a war accursed in its birth, and destined to recoil with curses and disasters frightful beyond description upon the whole French nation. It was a war declared by the Emperor and his minions, but denounced at the time by the Republicans of Paris, who could not, however, do more than simply protest.

On the other hand, the whole German people, at the summons of the Prussian King, sprang to arms with a stern and high enthusiasm that struck the world with awe. Old feuds were forgotten, old grievances buried; they remembered only their Fatherland and its solemn call. The heat of a common danger fused them all into one; and at last the heart of Germany throbbed with a common life. It was a spectacle wonderful and sublime; and the spirit of the hour lifted the common cause to a height of grandeur unsurpassed. The German flag became at once the symbol of liberty, progress, and civilization, and was cheered to the echo by a sympathizing world. The freedom, the safety, and the unity of the German people were all at stake; and in defending these against the deadly hate of Napoleon the Third, Germany fought the battle of the human race against the bully of Europe and the would-be despot of two hemispheres.

The storm at last broke. The annals of history present no parallel to the utter whirlwind and tornado of catastrophe that beat upon the armies of the Empire. Defeat trod upon the heels of defeat; and all the valor of France failed to wrench victory from the grasp of their terrible antagonists. Pressed back and crushed into the very dust, seeking refuge behind the guns of Strasburg and of Metz, outflanked, outgeneralled, outnumbered,—their communications cut and their forces torn asunder as by a thunderbolt,—the French were at last cooped up in the slaughter-pen of Sedan, and compelled to surrender the largest army that ever laid down their arms at one time. In the host thus captured was the Emperor himself,—the chief actor of the whole infernal drama. Thus fell the Second Empire with a crash that made the heavens ring. The Empress Regent fled from Paris by night with a single servant. The French people rose in bloodless revolution, and proclaimed the Republic. Never was retribution more swift, more terrible, more complete. The Empire was swept away like a cobweb, and the Emperor was a prisoner of war. Germany was wild with triumph, and the whole world echoed with applause.

At the outset King William proclaimed that he made war upon the Empire, not upon the French people. He has succeeded beyond the expectation of the most sanguine. The liberty and safety of the Fatherland are assured beyond a peradventure. For many and many a long year, no French ruler will dare disturb the repose of a people whose wrath is such swift and terrible destruction. The Empire that took the aggressive and plunged two great nations into such a sea of slaughter, has collapsed like an eggshell in the iron grasp of the victor, and left not a trace behind. The Emperor is a captive, to dwell henceforth wherever his captor may deign to assign him a residence. It was the Empire that was the aggressor,—and the Empire is annihilated. It was the Empire that King William made war upon,—and that war is ended by the extinction of his antagonist. For the good name of the German people, whose successes thus far have been followed by the rejoicings of every liberal spirit the wide world over,—for the sake of that liberty and justice which have thus far consecrated the German cause,—I hope that King William may perceive the grandeur of his opportunity, and, by his own spontaneous offer of peace on fair and just terms, seize the moral pre-eminence of Europe. The war of self-defence is closed by the capitulation of Sedan and the flight of the Empress Regent; if the war continues, it can only be a war of aggression against the French people, a war which King William proclaimed he did not make. If he makes it now, it will not be the war that won the universal sympathy of liberals, but a new war for new objects. The peace and safety of Germany are assured; the aggressive French Empire is wiped out of existence; the unity of Germany is an actual fact; whatever of glory there is in unparalleled martial achievements is already hers. WHAT HAS SHE STILL TO FIGHT FOR? Guarantees for the future and indemnity for the past she has indeed a right to ask, provided she respects the unity and liberty of France as she would have all nations respect her own unity and liberty. If such shall prove to be the policy of the Prussian government, it will command a profounder admiration than can be ever yielded to warlike exploits, however brilliant. I cannot disguise my earnest hope that Germany may show herself equal to the occasion, and prove by her moderation in the hour of dazzling triumph that she can set a new example to the nations. Much as I love Germany, and great as is the debt which every student, at least, is proud to confess he owes to her, I cannot follow her with my sympathy in a war waged for the dismemberment of France.

That the war against the Empire ended with the Emperor's surrender at Sedan and the Empress Regent's flight from Paris, is plain to every one. The only question is, does the French Republic propose to carry on the war for the same object, that is, the subjugation of Germany? That was the Emperor's object; but his quarrel was protested against at the outbreak of the war by the very Republicans who have now come into power at Paris. The very idea of invading Germany is at present so preposterous, that only an idiot could be suspected of entertaining it. With the Empire fell the Empire's ambition, the Empire's arrogance, the Empire's aggression; the quarrel begun by Napoleon has vanished into the past with the "dynasty" he hoped to found. Only last night's telegraphic despatches brought the account of an interview between Jules Favre and Lord Lyons, in which the former declared that "the Republic did not inherit the wars of the Empire, and that the Provisional Government would very gladly conclude peace, as soon as possible, on any terms not absolutely dangerous or dishonorable to France." All the proclamations and manifestoes of the Republic that I have seen avow but one purpose, that of national defence. If the war continues, it will present the painful spectacle of a defeated but still brave and powerful people defending a Republic against a Monarchy. It is sad enough under any circumstances for a liberal to see a high-spirited nation driven to desperation; but when it is a Republic fighting for its very existence against a Monarchy, the German liberals themselves may well pause and ask what is the secret and ultimate purpose of the war.

Now I can well understand the delight of Germans in the splendid success of their arms over the old enemy that once trod Germany so remorselessly into the mire. But there is a danger in this very delight which I must not be silent about. There is something nobler than the intoxication of national victory, the gratification of national revenge, the thirst for national aggrandizement at the expense of traditional foes. Is it not a nobler thing so to love humanity that reverence for universal justice shall outweigh the seductions of purely national feeling? So it seems to me; and I do earnestly long to hear the voice of German liberalism speaking out loudly at this crisis in behalf of justice and equal rights and republican liberty. It is not right,—I must say it with emphasis,—it is not right to dismember France, simply because her Emperor, drunk with pride and tempted to his ruin by the Nemesis that has at last hurled him into the gulf, desired to dismember Germany. Two wrongs will not make one right. The unity of one people is as sacred as that of another. The Republic is guiltless of Napoleon's crime. It would be an act of great magnanimity, so great that the world would thrill with admiration, if victorious Germany should pause, as she can now pause with perfect honor, and offer to the Republic of France fair and just terms of peace. France cannot sue for peace without a fatal wound to her self-respect. Powerless for aggression, she is still powerful for defence, and, with a pride which I cannot but respect, refuses to beg for pity as a conquered slave. Will not German liberals also respect the high spirit of a foeman worthy of their steel, and refuse to sanction the continuance of a war which has accomplished its ends? Depend upon it, if the war continues, the tide of the world's sympathy will turn. It is already beginning to turn. What I dread above everything at this juncture is lest I should not be permitted still to give Germany a hearty and undivided sympathy. To freedom, to republican institutions, to the equal rights of nations as of men, the sympathy of all liberals belongs; and I cannot bear to think that Germany should be made by the arts of king or courtier to fight against them.

The danger is this. King William has ordered the captive Napoleon to be treated as the ruling sovereign of France, and vehemently refuses to hear the Republic spoken of. These are significant facts. The King of Prussia believes in the divine right of kings, and will spare no republic that he can overthrow. Bismarck is no liberal, and will not work for liberal ideas. Suppose that the German armies take Paris, and strangle the new-born Republic gasping for its breath; will German liberals shout applause, when the King and Bismarck re-instate an Orleanist or a Bonaparte on the now vacant throne of France? Will that be a result that the friends of freedom can rejoice at? I trust the German people; but I have no trust for a Hohenzollern. The worst thing that could now happen to Germany itself would be the subversion of the French Republic. Let the Germans now retire in triumph, leaving the Republic intact; and how long would it be before Spain, perhaps Italy and England, would also be republics? And what would do so much for the final emancipation of Germany herself from the subjection of kingcraft and priestcraft, as the successful operation of republican governments in those countries? IT IS TIME TO SINK THE GERMAN IN THE LIBERALIST. It is time to demand the recall of German armies from the soil of France in the interest of universal liberty. If the German liberals now suffer themselves to be beguiled by the intoxication of triumph over the ancient enemy of their country, and sanction King William in crushing out the French Republic, will not he and all other despots laugh in their sleeves at the success of their schemes against freedom and progress? I sincerely hope that the voice and influence of all liberal Germans will be on the side of these, and against the cunning devices of all schemers for the perpetuation of royalty. Remember that, if King William prolongs the war, it will be against the French people, against French liberty, against republicanism everywhere. France has been already terribly punished and humiliated for the ambitious plots of Louis Napoleon; and she is to-day willing to accept any peace that shall respect the integrity of her territory. If she is required to pay the expenses of the war, to disband her standing army, to dismantle her frontier fortresses, and to give to her German-speaking provinces the right of voting freely whether they will belong to France or Germany, I think she will have no cause to complain; nor do I see how Germany can exact more without violating the very principle she has so gloriously maintained—the right of every nation to be unmolested, united, and self-governed in all things. This is a right sacredly to be respected; and when it is sacredly and universally respected, then will dawn the day longed for by every true republican, the day for the establishment of the UNITED STATES OF EUROPE. I cannot help hoping that King William will not be able craftily to turn the patriotic devotion of Germany into a sword for the slaughter of the French Republic, and thus to postpone indefinitely that happy day. Better far would it be for Germany herself now to withdraw her victorious troops, and give to the world the most magnificent of all spectacles—that of a nation powerful enough to be unjust, but virtuous enough to be just.

NOTE.—A letter received since reading the above, written by a German liberal who fought in 1848, has a passage so timely that it ought to be here appended:—

"We fight with Prussia; but if Wilhelm, the despot, goes on and hurts our baby Republic, we are going to fight with France, because these babies must and shall be raised, though it cost the life of a hundred thousand foxes. When we have got a united Germany, I think uncle Michael will have to bring us a republican baby; and Hohenzollern, Hapsburg, and all other mocking 'graces of God,' will have to go to the God they came from. Our God does not know these mocking-birds. I wish we could get a united Germany without them; but we shall have to do it or get it done in accordance with present conditions. That hope is ours. One of these days, their descendants and ours will alike enjoy the sweets of universal Liberty."

That is the ring of true metal. May its echoes be loud and long!

ADDRESS FROM THE COMMITTEES OF THE LONDON AND AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETIES TO THE FRIENDS OF PEACE.

DEAR FRIENDS: That which we have long feared has come upon the nations. The system of armed peace which the Governments of Europe have insisted on maintaining has issued, as such a system could not fail, sooner or later, to do, in open war between the two Powers which had most distinguished themselves by the excess of their warlike preparations. The conflict which has now commenced will, beyond doubt, prove to be one of the most awful in the history of the world. It will involve an incalculable destruction of human life and property, will fill myriads of hitherto happy homes with horror and anguish, will derange those beneficent ties of commerce by which mankind are bound to each other, will arrest the progress of liberty and civilization, will envenom men's spirits by evil passions, and will make the very name of Christianity—the religion of mercy and brotherly love—for the time a mockery in the earth.

But while overwhelmed with sorrow at this terrible event, we at least can look upon it with a conscience free from remorse. For many years we have not ceased, to the extent of our abilities and opportunities in our endeavors to impress upon governments and peoples the duty of using the lucid intervals of peace in adopting means which would give some guarantee to the nations against so dire a calamity as that which has now overtaken them. Far from having proclaimed, as we are sometimes mistakenly accused of doing, an approaching millennium of universal peace, our voice, on the contrary, has been one of constant deprecation and warning, on the ground that there was no security of peace while Europe was incessantly preparing for war, and while the nations were content to leave the continuance of peace at the mercy of the excited passions and hazardous accidents of the moment. Therefore it is that we have been strenuously contending, first, for a mutual and simultaneous reduction of those enormous armaments, which, kept up professedly in the interests of peace, are the most dangerous incentives to war; and, secondly, for the establishment of a Court of Arbitration, or some form of international jurisdiction, by which the differences of nations could be referred to the decision of reason and justice, instead of prejudice and passion. If there be any who doubt the efficacy of these means, will they suggest some means more efficacious, or are we to abandon mankind in despair to the eternal rule of barbarism and brute force?

What now, dear friends, remains for us to do? Unhappily, in those countries which are the actual seat of war, the voice of justice, reason, and religion is stifled, for that is the only condition on which war can be prosecuted. Our excellent fellow-laborers in the cause of Peace on the Continent, have not been wanting to their principles and convictions at this awful crisis. Consistently and courageously, even on the very arena of warlike agitation, have they, in every way that was open to them, uttered bold and eloquent protests against the war. But while it may be difficult for them to persevere in that course—for war is the most oppressive of tyrants—we must continue to denounce this great crime against humanity, and, undazzled by the glare of victory which may attend one side or the other, turn upon it steadily the light of sober reason and Christian morality. We must guard ourselves and use whatever influence we possess in guarding others, against the contagion of the warspirit, which is apt to spread even to those who are only spectators of the conflict. We must do all that lies in our power to prevent the area of the war being enlarged, and especially we must strenuously resist all attempts to involve our own country in this dreadful imbroglio. We must watch every opening for the restoration of peace, so as to encourage our own and other neutral Governments, to offer their mediation at the earliest possible opportunity with a view to bring the war to an end. And above all, we must stand prepared, whenever this deplorable conflict is closed, to invoke the public opinion of all Christendom in favor of such measures being taken as will for the future place the peace of the world beyond the reach of the personal ambition of individuals, or the capricious impulses of popular passion. And may we not hope that the horror and indignation which this war cannot fail ultimately to inspire, will convince all men of the supreme folly and wickedness of referring the disputes of nations to the blind and brutal arbitrament of the sword—will awaken so stern a demand among the millions of the oppressed populations of Europe as can no longer be resisted, for those measures of disarmament and arbitration for which we have been so long contending, and which seem the only means of escape from the vicious circle in which the nations have been so long revolving?

A FRENCH PROTEST AGAINST NAPOLEON'S WAR.

Count Gasparin, the staunch friend of the United States in our late war, published a brave protest in the Journal des Debats of July 18, which Dr. Thompson translates as follows in the Christian Union:—

"I have not hesitated, sir, to address you these lines. If they compromise me, so much the worse! I shall have obeyed my duty, and called forth whatever is in me against an act that my conscience disavows. Will it be said that in thus agitating the question I am wanting in patriotism? Fox and his friends believed themselves very patriotic when they condemned in plain terms the war against France. Some would lead us on by the single phrase, 'The flag is engaged; we have but to follow that.' That is to say, we ought no longer to speak, to write, to think. Never was a maxim of despotism better invented. A declaration of war is blurted out, the flag is engaged; and forthwith opinion must be released! the tribune released! the flag is engaged! But, if the flag is engaged, so is our conscience; and we will not, we cannot accept the least fraction of moral responsibility in a butchery that nothing can render lawful in our eyes. There are two kinds of patriotism. There is that which follows the flag wherever it flies, though it be the flag of Leclerc going to re-establish slavery in St. Domingo; there is that which wrestles at its own risk and peril with all that would seem to compromise the honor of the country. For this latter patriotism, the honor of the country, does not consist in the number of battles won, but in practising justice, and becoming the representative, the patron of all generous causes. This patriotism has also its ambitions, as you see, and it lays out for the country no mean role. In any event, it was necessary that this be said. For wounded conscience there is not one relief possible but to protest. Many others think as I do; but were I alone, I would none the less relieve my conscience by publishing this protest and signing it."

THE UPAS TREE.—We have received two letters inquiring whether the familiar account of the Upas tree (or the "Utopia tree," as we once heard it called in a sermon from a city pulpit) is true or not. The story is a mere fable, which first gained credence in Europe through the narrative of Foersch, a surgeon in the Dutch East India Company's service, published about the middle of the last century. He described the tree as poisoning the air of the whole valley where it grew, so that neither animal nor vegetable could live there. But when Deschamps and Leschenault visited Java, they found that this deadly tree flourished only where vegetation was most luxuriant, and that it was haunted by birds and insects. In another part of Java, there is a narrow valley where neither animal nor vegetable life can exist, but this is owing to the exhalation of carbonic-acid gas from an old volcanic crater. Upas is a Malay word meaning poison, and is applied to a variety of vegetable products. The proper name of the so-called Upas tree is antjar or antiar (the Antiaris toxicaria of Leschenault) which grows in many parts of the Sunda and Philippine islands. It is a very beautiful tree, and sometimes grows to the height of a hundred feet. From its milky juice, mixed with black pepper and the juices of certain roots, the Malays prepare a poison for their arrows which is very prompt and virulent in its action. Cloth is sometimes made from the fibrous bark of the antjar, but unless the fibre has been thoroughly cleansed, it produces a painful itching when worn next to the skin.

Since writing the above, we have met with an account of this tree in Pouchet's Universe. He states that the juice is not poisonous unless introduced beneath the skin. While Leschenault was examining one of these trees, which he had cut down, the exudation from the broken branches flew over his face and his hands, but without injuring him. But eight drops of the juice, injected into the veins of a horse, killed it directly; and criminals have been known to die in five or six minutes after being pricked in the breast with a lancet dipped in the juice.—Journal of Chemistry.

Says Jean Paul Richter: "To insure modesty, I would advise the educating of the sexes together; for two boys will preserve twelve girls, or two girls twelve boys, innocent, amid winks, jokes, and improprieties, merely by that instinctive sense which is the forerunner of matured modesty. But I will guarantee nothing in a school where girls are alone together, and still less where boys are."

Sheridan remarked, in parliamentary language, on entering a crowded committee room, "Will some member move that I may take the chair?"

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"For two weeks past I have failed to receive my accustomed copy of THE INDEX. I could better spare any other publication that falls under my notice; for its contents are at once the keenest incitement to moral effort, and the most quieting balm to fevered thought that I experience.

On rejecting the fallacies of the popular religious theories under which I was reared, I fell into a state of doubt which for many years acted both as disquieting and stupefying in the way toward juster views. But the ideas which I have encountered in your pages, and heard from speakers who hold kindred sentiments, have, during the past few months, made an epoch in my life most sweet and refreshing, getting more harmony out of the old chaos than I could have imagined possible.

The blind problems of existing evil and future personal identity still haunt me rather badly. The first, with its systems of cruelty which seem inherent in both human and lower organization, and the seemingly unavoidable contortions and miseries of social circumstance, is hard to reconcile with our much petted and greatly desired notion of an intelligent cause or controller of all things. Then, as to the second; although in perfect accordance with my previous view, when I find one whose general judgment commands my highest respect expressing uncertainty as to our future conscious being, I cannot resist a feeling of depression and disappointment. While I dread the flattery of false hopes, and desire to meet the worst that is in store with steady patience, I yet am fond of seeing others trot out their argument of the ancient and universal belief, inhering even in the savage thought, with their own cheery and immovable faith. This is certainly deserving of some reliance, in spite of the possible evanescence of our spiritual composition.

Then, too, the steady improvement so marked in all moral history,—that has been my greatest hope. If we have an intelligent Father, and our instincts bear resemblance to his own, if we are to be blotted out as we come along, how can he enjoy those glorious effects alone, without the companionship of those who have shared the beginnings and continuation of the process? How could he toss away these aspirations that are our dignity and joy?

But it may be with regard to both and all such problems that we shall some day gain a bird's eye view, feebly akin to our conception of an omniscient view, which will give us some clue to the teasing mystery."

—"There is something to me intensely interesting in the fact that woman feels such an interest in this theological reform. It may be either weak or foolish in me, but I confess that in this new warfare I long for the countenance and co-operation of woman. Her moral instincts, as well as natural, are so much purer and safer than ours, that I feel delighted and strengthened when she bids us attack the strongholds of consecrated error, and commends our courage and success."

—"I have seen your Prospectus in the Toledo Blade, and wish you to send me a specimen copy. I think it is what I have long wished for,—a periodical which, while it does not ignore religion, advocates a system which does not conflict with common sense. If I like the paper, I will try to send you a few subscribers."

—"If you prepare those bound volumes of THE INDEX for distribution at the end of its first year, please count me in for one copy. I hope you will have encouragement enough to justify printing the missing numbers; but also that the 'limited number' has not been subscribed for as yet!"

—"Please mark my name for a bound copy of THE INDEX for first year of publication. Amid all the failures and disappointments that we reach through orthodoxy, it is refreshing to strike now and then something so fresh, true, and free as THE INDEX."

—"I have enjoyed the spirit and matter of your paper very much; and, of all the weeklies I have been subscriber to, it is the only one I have ever preserved for binding."

ORDINATION.

I see, through golden gates ajar,
Midst radiant hosts a Dove descend,
As midst the stars a brighter star;
The white wings kiss thy brow, O friend,
The still air palpitates thy name,
While reverent myriads bless and bend;
And up through dazzling aisles of flame
The refulgent tides of glory roll,
Till all is vanished whence it came.
And was the splendor in my soul?
O friend, Time waits upon thy will—
Paint thou the vision on his scroll,
Like him, the Master Artist still!

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also, an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

RADICAL CO-OPERATION.

The subjoined paragraph, from the Syracuse Daily Standard of Sept. 14, shows that there is a rapidly increasing activity in the direction of co-operation for radical reform:—

"CORTLAND PROGRESSIVE ASSOCIATION.—On Sunday last the friends of free thought and free investigation, residing in Cortland village and vicinity, met and organized a Radical Society, to be known as the 'Cortland Progressive Association.'"

The most simple articles of association were adopted and subscribed to by some twenty-five of those present, and the following officers were elected:—

President—Stephen Brewer.

Vice President—John W. Strowbridge.

Recording and Corresponding Secretary—S. T. Pomroy.

A committee was appointed to procure a permanent place of meeting for the Association.

A lecture by Professor William Denton was read and short speeches made by a number of the members, after which the Association adjourned for one week.

The object of the Association is to establish the authority of reason and right, and to maintain truth, freedom, progress and equal rights.

There are many radical persons in and about Cortland, and the prospects are that the Society will prove a success.

We understand that this new association has been called into existence through the efforts of a few earnest radicals of Cortland, acting in conjunction with the Radical Club of Syracuse, N. Y. There can be little doubt that more can be accomplished by the formation of such local associations as these than in any other way. We congratulate our friends in Syracuse and Cortland on the success of this new movement, and hope that radicals elsewhere will be stimulated by it to determined action of the same kind.

Our conviction grows stronger every day that these radical societies or clubs are a necessity of the times. Under the "Department of the Free Religious Association" in our present issue, will be found some very valuable observations and reflections by Mr. Potter on the causes why radical societies have so often proved weak and transient. In forming new ones, let the mistake be carefully shunned of "putting new wine into old bottles." The more frank and explicit their disconnection with the Christian Church, so much the better will be their prospect of continuance, and so much the greater will be their influence for good. The democratic character of Radical Clubs renders any affiliation with the Church, however nominal, dangerous and embarrassing. Let us have courage and foresight enough, in establishing new societies for mutual culture and general reform, to shun the rock on which those have split who did not fully appreciate the irreconcilableness of the old and the new. Enthusiasm is chilled and effort paralyzed by any ambiguity of position; and in the indecisiveness of the attitude held by many radical organizations towards the Christian religion,—in their half-acceptance and half-rejection of a system which, as such, has become a millstone about the neck of humanity,—we read the secret of their powerlessness to affect public opinion or to arouse a widespread enthusiasm for ideas.

Principles have no pity for our half-heartedness, our well-meaning concessions to public prejudice, our reluctance to make sacrifices, or even our honest muddiness and confusion of thought. If we do not follow them implicitly, and take them for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse,—if for any reason whatsoever we shrink from putting our whole faith in them, and consecrating to them "our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor,"—they grind us between the upper and the nether millstones, and our "damnation is just." The Christian Church grew and flourished, and still flourishes, because it has had men who believed in it to the extent of giving themselves up to it, body and soul. When radicals are fired with an equal faith in freedom and humanitarian religion, they will conquer the world. No society ever yet failed that was true to a clearly grasped idea in word and act. It is faith that wins; and it ought to win. But countless societies have failed which halted between two ideas, or which were lukewarm in serving a single idea, or which had no idea "to speak of." Nature determines the conditions of success, and is as pitiless to incapacity, irresolution, and bewilderment, as to wilful disobedience. She says to us,—"Keep your heads cool and your hearts warm. Believe in truth and serve it; but first of all understand it."

America is full of a crude radicalism which strikes out wildly in all directions, and hits nothing. It loads its gun with oysters instead of bullets, and befouls its game without hurting it. What radicalism needs to-day is concentration of intellect and will on a definite purpose. Let every radical society, club, or association, as the first condition of success, define its own purpose and position, both to itself and to the world; and its success will then depend on the energy, courage, and persistency with which it works. If it has ideas, and urges them as the abolitionists urged the idea of immediate emancipation, there will be no such thing as failure. But haziness of thought, doubtfulness of position, irresoluteness of purpose, distraction of aim, apathy of feeling, are just as fatal to the success of an association as to that of an individual, lead to an aping of methods incongruous with its real spirit, paralyze its members, and deprive it of all influence with the world. Radicals must concentrate their energies on something practicable, real, and valuable, or their associations will be as feeble and short-lived in the future as too many of them have been in the past. They must know where they are, and what they are about. But with clear convictions, clear aims, and a clear position, they can accomplish wonders in the true education of humanity.

MR. C. D. B. MILLS, of Syracuse, N. Y. would like to make a few engagements to lecture in the West during the latter part of the winter. He has lectures on the "Relations of Religion and Science," on the "Future of Religion," and on the "Opening Era,"—the latter perhaps a little more popular than the others. His terms will be moderate, and his address will be as above given. Mr. Mills is well known to the readers of the Radical as one of its very best contributors. Some articles of his on "Pythagoras" and the "Eleatic School," full of the finest appreciation of the finest thought, attracted at the time no little attention, and evinced a mind of a high and rare order. Wherever an audience can be got together qualified to enjoy the ripe reflections of a wise, calm thinker, we confidently recommend Mr. Mills as one who will not disappoint them. We only wish we could ourselves share the privilege of hearing him.

WE are indebted to Dr. D. White, of St. Louis, for a copy of the articles of association of "The Progressive Spiritualists," a society just formed in that city. One of the provisions is that "no political or other inharmonious topics shall be introduced." We more than doubt the wisdom of any such restriction as this. A truly "progressive" society will find no topic "inharmonious" which, like politics, concerns the well-being of man. Until they have mastered the lesson of respect for all sincere opinions, they have still to learn the A B C of free thought.

THE following anecdote is worthy of more than a laugh. It embodies a philosophy. Whoever has attempted to argue a thoroughly selfish man into the spirit of self-sacrifice, will see the point:—

"Were you in the fight?" said an officer to an elderly negro on a steamer after taking a fort. "Had a little taste of it, sah." "Stood your ground, did you?" "No, sah, I runs." "Run at the first fire, did you?" "Yes, sah; would hab run sooner, if I had known it was comin'." "Why, that's not very creditable to your courage." "Dat isn't my line, sah; cookin' my perfession." "Well, but have you no regard for your reputation?" "Reputation's nothing to me by the side ob life." "Do you consider your life worth more than other people's?" "It's worth more to me, sah."

On "utilitarian" principles, the negro's logic is perfect. It takes a nobler philosophy than "utilitarianism" to explain the life of a true hero.

MATTER AND LAW.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—A few weeks since, you had the kindness to publish, and comment on, a short interrogatory article of mine, under the title of "The Intelligibility of Nature." I now ask the privilege of a very few words more on the subject.

Theism of late, especially since I became a subscriber to THE INDEX, has assumed a greater appearance of consistency to me than formerly; although the difficulties attending it still seem to be numerous.

For instance, you cite analogies to show that the regular workings of Nature have an intelligent cause. Now I cannot readily conceive of cause and effect in any other way than that the cause must always precede the effect. Therefore, if I accept the theory that Nature's laws have a cause (intelligent or otherwise), I must believe there was a time when they were not; yet matter without law is to me incomprehensible. How then? Matter also a result and brought into existence simultaneously with its laws? Incomprehensible also. And then have I not as great reason to believe intelligence to be a result as matter? Then why may not this "Intelligent Cause" itself be an effect, and so ad infinitum?

I will not occupy further space with objections; perhaps many of them would disappear, did I understand Nature better. Could you not give us an essay on your idea of the attributes of God, as manifested by Nature, or at least what are not his attributes? I think it would be of interest to a great many of your readers.

Yours truly,

R.

[1. Something must always have existed, or else nothing would now exist. It is impossible to believe that the universe could have suddenly started into being out of absolute nothingness.

2. Something, therefore, must be admitted to be eternal and uncaused; and it is unreasonable to demand a cause for the simple existence of this something (substance). The idea of creation as the "production of something out of nothing" is puerile. Matter and force are equally indestructible and equally uncreatable.

3. The effects, therefore, for which we may properly demand a cause are not the uncreated substance or immanent force or eternal laws of Nature, but only her changes, events, and shifting forms. "Matter without law" or force is impossible even to thought, since we can form no conception of matter which does not presuppose both force and law.

4. It is true that the cause must precede the effect. But, according to what is above said, it is not true that Nature's laws are an effect. Nature's endless metamorphoses are the real effects to be explained; but the laws that govern them are simply the manner, always the same under the same circumstances, in which the universal force acts. The real question is—does the action of this universal force indicate intelligence? If it does, the cause anterior to the effect is intelligent; if not, we must explain as best we can the fact that science finds Nature an intelligible book. Fate, Chance, or God,—which is the author? —ED.]

MOVER AND MOVED.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I think it cannot be rationally and therefore not successfully affirmed that substance of any kind gave form to or took on form of itself—the immobility of matter must first be denied.

If the immobility of matter (per se) be conceded, does not this necessitate the further concession, since motion exists, that matter had and has a motor, and that matter and motor are not the same in kind—and does not motion imply the pre-existence of a mover and something to be moved—and does not the existence of forms necessitate the acknowledgment of the pre-existence of a former or maker, and something to be formed? And further. Does not the existence of intelligence, reproducing forms necessitate and prove the pre-existence and concert of intelligence in the production of such forms? It will hardly be affirmed that even the simplest voluntary actions of men (the highest known forms of organized matter) are not prompted and performed by and under the influence and power of some kind and degree of intelligence. And if so, how can we entertain the idea that what we behold of the vast universe of organized matter exists and moves without the concert of intelligence? As great an absurdity as the miraculous conception story when presented as a historic fact, in my judgment. What does Mr. Einstein mean by the spontaneity of matter? Does he not mean, after all, the same that we mean when we speak of the intelligent indwelling spirit or principle that gives form and motion to all matter (and without which matter of any form whatever can have no consciousness of existence), that we express by the term—God?

Can matter be produced out of nothing? or intelligence out of non-intelligence, or matter unintelligent per se?

Truly yours,

HAVANA, O., July 23, 1870.

MORALS AND CAUSATION.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Sept. 5, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—I was much impressed by the "Plea for Necessity" by L. T. I. Not being accustomed to reason upon questions of pure metaphysics, the argument seemed to me to be not only subtle, but strong, and I awaited your reply with interest. I was disappointed to find that you admit the plea to be unanswerable unless we deny at the outset that moral phenomena are under the law of causation; and even then you restrict the power of free choice to such narrow limits that it is difficult to see what the control that the individual has over his activities amounts to. I had supposed that the doctrine of Freedom had a stronger case.

You say:—"Now we claim that the doctrine of Necessity has no basis but a speculative theory of causation,—the a priori assumption that the law of absolute causation must cover all moral as well as all physical phenomena; and we also claim that the doctrine of Freedom rests on the fact of man's moral nature, and cannot be denied without denying man's moral nature. This L. T. I. has denied in reducing virtue to 'great good fortune.' Our assertion is thus made good that his doctrine rests only on speculation, while ours rests on facts."

In other words, we make certain assertions which reassert our former assertion and thus make it good.

Of course you do not claim that moral phenomena, or anything else, exist without a cause. Is it, then, unwarrantable to assume that "a universal fact of human knowledge," the existence whereof must be ascribed to some cause, is likely to remain under the guidance of the law that brought it into being? Are not moral phenomena tested by an ever-shifting standard? Are they not things of change, of growth, of development? Can we conceive of growth or development where causation is inoperative?

The supporters of "Natural Selection" claim that "it also operates in the case of men, among whom there is a perpetual survival of the fittest; in the most barbarous conditions of mankind the struggle is almost entirely between individuals; in proportion as civilization has increased among men, it is easy to trace the transference of a great part of the struggle, little by little, from individuals to tribes, nations, corporations, societies and similar combinations; and accompanying this transference has been undeniably the development of the moral qualities and social virtues." And Prof. Owen, although as a conservative he rejects the theory of Natural Selection, in developing his "Derivation Hypothesis," draws a comparison "between life and magnetism, and between all the actions of living beings, from the attraction of the amaba by a bit of meat to the highest phenomena of consciousness;" of which his conclusion is that, "from the magnet that chooses between steel and zinc to the philosopher who chooses between good and evil, the difference is one of degree and not of kind."

This is speculative theory. That "the law of absolute causation must cover all moral as well as all physical phenomena" is, perhaps, nothing more than an a priori assumption; but of the assertion that that upon which the doctrine of Freedom rests,—namely, the fact of man's moral nature—is independent of the law of causation and hence exists without cause, it may be said that the idea is simply inconceivable. Necessity pushed to the extreme of Fatalism may make of shame and self-respect absurdities, and teach that we cannot help doing whatever we do. It is, then, the basis of all charity. Freedom thus logically treated would teach that "not only all actions, but that all beliefs are matters of the will, and that a perverted will is the only reason why all men do not accept our advanced and liberal views—whatever they may be. The Romish Church has always maintained that faith is controlled by the will, and its history is one of constant efforts to overcome in various ways the wilful obstinacy of unbelievers.

The Freedom which is "the inspiration of the nineteenth century and the breath of life of American civilization" is the result of the tardy recognition of the truth, that men must of necessity have different standards of morality and different religious and political ideas.

Rather than insist upon the inconceivable idea that the phenomena are independent of the law of absolute causation, in order to establish the consistency of shame and self-respect and the apparent freedom of man's moral nature, would it not be better to defer the attempt to reconcile the seeming contradictions until we have more light?

Very respectfully,

E. R. L.

[We made no attempt to "reconcile" the theories of Freedom and Necessity, which we regard as irreconcilable. Of the two contradictory doctrines, we gave our reasons for accepting one and rejecting the other. Some persons (not very wisely) endeavor to accept both. All that we insist upon is the recognition of actual facts. That man is a moral being, or (what is precisely the same thing) a free being, is a fact to which we cannot let theory put out our eyes.

Men act from motives in all actions that can be called moral. Are motives causes, in the same sense that a lighted match is the cause of a gunpowder explosion? The gunpowder cannot help exploding, though a thousand lives are thereby lost. On the Necessarian theory, the murderer who applies the match is as innocent as the gunpowder, and for the same reason—he could not help doing what he did. When mankind are so far advanced as to look with no more horror on the murderer than on the gunpowder, they will accept that theory,—not, we think, before. It is no part of our theory that men act without motives; but we deny that motives are "efficient" causes, i. e. causes that absolutely compel their effects. We regard them simply as "final" causes, i. e. reasons for acting which may or may not be acted upon, according to man's free choice. This is what we mean by denying that moral actions are necessitated or governed by the law of absolute causation. Whoever is conscious of acting otherwise than by outward or inward compulsion will perceive that we advocate no "inconceivable idea," but simply state in terms the common consciousness of man.

We think that a careful perusal of our reply to L. T. I. will remove the difficulties expressed above, which show that we have not been wholly understood.—ED.]

THEISM IN RUSSIA.

FRIEND ABBOT:—I have been greatly interested in the account given by Hepworth Dixon, in his "Free Russia," of the life and labors of Nicolas Ilyin, who seems to have been a Theistic or Free Religious Reformer in that country. Thinking that a statement of the principal facts would be interesting to your readers, many of whom may not see Mr. Dixon's instructive volume, I have prepared the following abstract of Chapter XXII, which you may publish if you see fit.

Nicolas Ilyin was born in Poland. His mother was a Pole, and his father, though of Swedish origin, held the rank of General in the Imperial service. Ilyin is the Russian form of Elias.

Nicolas was highly educated in the Jesuits' College in Polotsk. He was noted for his studious habits and religious turn of mind. He neither drank nor swore. At his graduation he took a high degree, and joined the army with the rank of ensign. A hard reader, he gave up his nights and days to studies that were then unusual in the mess-room and the camp.

His father was a Greek Catholic, his mother a Roman Catholic. The Jesuits did all in their power to win their favorite student to their side. But Nicolas must hear all sides and judge for himself. There were many learned Jewish Rabbis in the town of Polotsk, and Nicolas talked with them about his studies, and even went with them to their synagogue. He read the Mishna and Gemara, and he conceived of a rational and yet essentially reverent form of faith which would place the great family of Abraham (those who were Israelites indeed—those of the Spiritual Circumcision) under a common flag.

He thought the time was fully come for a reconciliation of all the religious societies on theistic ground; and he conceived it his special mission to lead in bringing about that happy concord of all good and true men, of which he had had a glorious vision—to lay the foundation of a wide and comprehensive church.

Beginning with God, he closed with man. Setting aside, as things indifferent, all the points on which men disagree, he got rid of the immaculate conception, the symbol of the cross, the form of baptism, the practice of confession, the official Church, and the sacerdotal caste. In his broad review, nothing was of first importance save the unity of God, the fraternity of men.

Gifted with a noble presence and an eloquent tongue, he began to teach this doctrine of the coming time, announcing his belief in the general reconciliation of all the friends of God. In these early days of his religious strife, he seems to have dreamed that the Orthodox Church afforded him the readiest means of reconciling creeds and men. He obtained a license to preach from the Orthodox (Greek) bishop, who hoped he would bring in stragglers to the fold from among the many sectaries to whom he proposed especially to address himself. But Ilyin saw his mistake and speedily set up for himself a broader camp in another name and under a bolder flag.

In every place he drew to himself the hearts of men, winning them alike by the splendor of his eloquence and by the purity of his life. Early married, blessed with children, happy in his home, Ilyin could give hand and heart to the work he had found. A good soldier, a good man of business, he was sent to the government works in the Ural Mountains, where in the midst of his military duties, as Captain of Artillery, he found time for preaching. He retained, up to this time, a nominal connection with the Orthodox Church. But the martyrs of free thought, whom he met in the mines of Barancha, were to him what the Kafir chieftains were to the Bishop of Natal. They put him to the test, led him to scrutinize his own belief, and brought him to see that freedom and harmony in religion were not to be expected from metropolites and monks.

Ilyin, from this time, separated himself completely from the Orthodox Church, and secretly (as was thought necessary) formed a free religious association, of which he was the recognized leader. These Ural dissenters called themselves "Right-hand Brethren." The right hand of fraternity and fellowship they extended to all good men and true, who were willing to unite with them on the simple basis of love to God and man, and God worshipped by servman. The right hand of friendship and affection they extended to all the needy, the ignorant and degraded. They taught very strongly the necessity and sanctity of mutual help. They spoke to the poor and bade them take heart; bidding them look not only for bliss in a better world, but for the reign of peace and plenty on the earth. In the great questions of serf and soil, they took part with the peasant against his lord, though Ilyin himself was of noble birth.

These things appeared to the director-general of mines anarchical and dangerous. Protopopoff, a leading man among the "Brethren," was accordingly placed on trial for some trifling offence, the real reason for his arrest being some expression against the Church. Ilyin, his teacher, appeared in public as his friend and advocate. Protopopoff was condemned, and Ilyin, closely watched, was soon after denounced to the minister of finance by the director-general, as a man who was compromising the public peace. The new Society was said to be dangerous, inasmuch as it was perfect in unity and made missionary work the first article of their association. A member who could not or would not bring others into the Society, was eventually regarded as an unworthy member. False charges were made, of course, against the new Society, as that they were Communists, that they circumcised, &c; but of these there was no proof.

The Council in St. Petersburg appointed a special commission to proceed to the Ural mines and investigate the facts. This commission arrested many of the "Brethren" and seized some manuscript tracts, some of which were simply selections from the Sermon on the Mount. Ilyin avowed himself the writer of these tracts, and challenged boldly the right of the commissioners to judge and condemn them. Struck by his eloquence and courage, the commission hardly knew what to say; but, as practical men, they hinted that a Captain of the Imperial Artillery holding such doctrines must be unsound in mind! They so reported to the Holy Governing Synod, and by their order he was immured in the Convent of Solovetsk, in the Frozen Sea, there to remain, as the sentence runs, "under sound discipline, until you have been brought to a better mind." There, in his dungeon cell, this learned and noble man—this eloquent herald of the renaissance age, whose feet were "beautiful upon the mountains"—this prophet and priest of the new (and yet old) rational religion, remains to-day, and will remain, probably as long as he lives; for he will never renounce his views. Once he escaped in a boat, by the help of some soldiers whose hearts he had won; but he was discovered and sent back to his dungeon, while the soldiers were sent to the Siberian mines for life. "My efforts to procure a pardon for the old man failed," says Mr. Dixon; and he adds, truly—"Men like Nicolas Ilyin are the salt of this earth; men who will go through fire and water for their thought; men who would live a true life in a dungeon rather than a false life in the richest mansions of the world."

Miscellaneous.

SURRENDERING TOO SOON.

(By Col. Higginson, in the Woman's Journal.)

I once had a call from a well-dressed young lady, the daughter of a farmer, who wished for a situation as house-maid, where she could bring her own piano-forte, and practice in the afternoons, when her work was ended. It was necessary to decline the offer, for this reason, if for no other, that our small house was already disproportionately crowded by one piano, and if we had added a second, the performer must have sat upon the sidewalk. This objection apart, I have always wished that we could have accepted the proposal. It would have been such an experience to look back upon; such a fact to tell to Englishmen!

The young woman did not follow up her purpose, but obtained the means to continue her music lessons instead. But had she persevered in her first plan, she could undoubtedly have found a place. There were very intelligent families in the town where this occurred, who would gladly have employed such a girl—if she could make bread as well as music, which was true in this instance—and would have put her, where she deserved to be, on an equality with themselves. There were families, for instance, where some child was already taking music lessons, and where the parents, at a personal sacrifice, were hiring a piano. To them, this peculiar appendage would have made the handmaiden more attractive.

And this occurrence (which was of course an extreme case) has often suggested to me the question, whether our American girls would not have done better to have held to the position they had in domestic service, twenty-five years ago, instead of abandoning it without an effort, when the less educated Irish came in? We all admit that the Irish are masters and mistresses of the situation now, that they dictate their own wages, their own hours, their own treatment, their own diet. I have known an Irishman to ask an employer in New York, what brand of claret he allowed his servants. The authority, the mastery, are confessedly on the side of the kitchen. Was it wise in our American girls to surrender this garrison instead of holding it, and dictating their own terms?

It is observable that in all statements of the grievances of American girls who seek household service

(as in that of a correspondent from Manchester, N. H., in the Woman's Journal of last week), it is always assumed that such servants are a subject class, that they are, for instance, obliged to associate with ignorant and dirty persons, and not allowed to go out except at long intervals. But the Irish settle these matters for themselves very easily. They insist on going out when they please. I do not know an employer who can keep such girls in, against their will, in the afternoon or evening. They choose their own associates, and constantly leave their situations, if necessary, to get rid of a disagreeable companion. It is rare to find an Irish girl who will eat with colored domestics; and where both classes are employed, there is usually a separate table. As to their occupying a room jointly, I never heard of an instance. Why should American girls fail of having their own way, where the Irish so easily succeed?

It may be said that the Irish girls, being more numerous, command the market. But the American girls commanded the market twenty-five years ago, and voluntarily relinquished it. If they would again enter it, there are plenty of employers who would gladly give them all they would ask—high wages, abundant liberty, the choice of associates, all, indeed, that is now possessed by the Irish. For aught I know, they could each have a piano also. If the class of American girls who now do housework in country taverns would consent to do it elsewhere, they would have no competitors except among the excellent Nova Scotia girls, who are now so eagerly sought for. A dozen such American girls in any town of five or ten thousand inhabitants, could soon influence the whole labor market, and open the way for a great many others.

I do not write in the expectation of doing much to overcome the strong current, which now keeps American girls out of domestic service. But it is impossible to write about the condition of women, and ignore the fact that there is one great department of labor in which the demand exceeds the supply. It diminishes one's pity for poor girls who starve, and even one's charity for those who sin, when one thinks of these numerous households constantly imploring, "Come and work for me ten hours a day, at $3 per week and your board." Those accepting this offer need fear no tyranny nor insult, for Irish girls submit to none, and those who ill-treat them soon find themselves without servants. There is no sacrifice of pride, except such as intelligent young men would be willing to make during their early struggles. I know men who are now prominent in society in our cities, who have themselves been domestic servants; and who cares? For one, I should far rather see a kinswoman of mine support herself by paid housework than by that instrument of suicide known as a needle, or that machine of a thousand needle power, the sewing machine.

Yes, I believe that white American girls have surrendered household service too soon. Personally, I have a decided liking for both the Irish and the colored races, but I think that in this department they have more than their share. Employers themselves need domestics with whom they shall be more on an equality. For one, I like the frank fearlessness with which the farmers' daughters in New Hampshire boarding-houses put in a word of information from behind your chair. I liked the young theological student from Bates College, who drove and groomed our horses at Bethlehem, and, if necessary, came into the dining-room to help in carving. These things were pleasant in themselves, and it was as good as a play to see how they astonished some of the city visitors. But why should it be necessary to go all the way to the White Mountains to find them?

Many of us who frequent a certain hospitable house in Boston are well acquainted with a certain intelligent American handmaiden who there officiates. Almost as eager as her mistress to make every one comfortable, she seems nearly as essential a presence, when the day for the monthly literary club comes round. She receives the guests at the outer door, personally knows them all, has the signatures of the most notable in her autograph book, yet takes no liberties, puts on no airs, nor foregoes any to which she is entitled. During the conversation she lingers on the outskirts, comprehends all that is said except the things which nobody comprehends, and once was known to put in a modest word for herself. It would cause an immediate dissolution of the club, I verily believe, if on entering that door some Monday, we should be received by a solemn man-servant in livery, instead of—let us call her "Fanny." Yet if there is one such, why should there not be a thousand? If there were, the problem of American housekeeping would be solved, without waiting for the Chinese. It is to aid the arrival of a few more such, that these words are written.

The colored race are not to be outdone in shrewdness of retort. A little cabin boy on board a ship, the captain of which was a religious man, was called up to be flogged for some misdemeanor. Little Jack appeared before the captain weeping bitterly, and, falling upon his knees, he cried, "Pray, sir, will you wait till I say my prayers?" "Certainly, I will," replied the captain. "Well, then," said Jack, looking up triumphantly, "I'll say them when I get ashore."

A physician who was attending Colman during a severe illness, apologized to him one morning for coming so late, saying that he was suddenly called to see a man who had fallen into a well. "Did he kick the bucket, doctor?" was Colman's quick response.

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

REPORT FOR 1870.

The REPORT of the Annual Meeting of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870 has been printed in pamphlet form, and is for sale at the price of fifty cents for a single copy; in packages of five or more, thirty cents each. It can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS., also in Boston at the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield St.; and of Crosby and Damrell, 100 Washington St., in Cincinnati at Bloch & Co., 150 W. Fourth St., in Toledo at the office of THE INDEX. The Report contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, D. A. WASSON, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, F. E. ABBOT, SAMUEL JOHNSON, RABBI I. M. WISE, T. W. HIGGINSON and Wm. H. CHANNING.

The chief object of this department of THE INDEX is to report the special doings of the Free Religious Association, and to give information of such facts as the Secretary may collect from any quarter concerning the general movement which the Association represents. But sometimes the Secretary finds it convenient, or may think it of use, to depart somewhat from this main purpose, and to express, as in the subjoined article, opinions of his own on matters of interest to the Association. In all such expressions of opinion, he wishes to be understood as speaking only for himself. The department may have more of this kind of articles hereafter than heretofore; in which not only the Secretary, but the President and other officers of the Association, may state their convictions as well as report facts,—on the now well understood principle that each writer utters his views independently and commits no member of the Association.

FREE CHURCHES.

The dissolution of the Free Church in Lynn, Mass., which was organized on the basis of the natural religious sentiment and of unlimited free inquiry into religious truth, has given a new opportunity to the Christian sects to use their oft repeated argument that Rationalism and Radicalism cannot support religious institutions. See, it is said, how quickly the Free Churches go to pieces as soon as the personal ministry, which by its ability may have organized and for a time sustained them, is withdrawn. The free society at Lynn, though, under the able and scholarly services of its preacher, Mr. Samuel Johnson, it has had a successful career of seventeen years, immediately upon Mr. Johnson's resignation of the position voted to disband. Theodore Parker's Society in Boston has dwindled to a little handful of people, who even in a small hall make but a thin congregation. Attempts at free churches several years ago in Barre, Watertown, Worcester, Groveland, were abandoned after a brief trial.

Later attempts in New York, St. Louis, Chicago, have also come to nought. More recently still, Rev. Rowland Connor's Society in Boston (which, though organized as a Universalist Society, became a Free Church), on his withdrawal as its minister, voted to dissolve. And to this showing with regard to the free societies, it is added that ministers in whom free and rationalistic tendencies become dominant are very apt to leave the ministry for some other profession. Even when not compelled to leave by the conservative opposition of their societies, many of them evidently find something inharmonious between their radical beliefs and even the freest existing forms of religious service and organization, and gradually drop out of the ministry into other work. It is claimed, therefore, that Radicalism in religion has proved its inability to sustain religious institutions; that, whatever it may do for private character, it cannot organize and nourish a church; that it does not construct, but is a dissolvent of social religious organization.

Sufficient attention has not been given to this argument. Radicals themselves have not, we think, sufficiently considered the bearing of the facts here pointed out. For our part, we are disposed to grant that there is a large measure of truth in the argument; to grant, at least, that Radicalism cannot support what is commonly understood in Christendom under the terms "church" and "religious institutions."

Of course it is not to be granted for a moment that Radicalism in religion is a failure because so many of its attempted churches have failed. Nor is it to be admitted that these churches, however short-lived they may have been, have failed of all good or permanent results. He must be very ignorant who should think seriously to measure Theodore Parker's influence by the weakened condition of his Society since his death. And all the free churches must have done something towards developing and maintaining that power in free ideas which outlasts men and organizations. Nor, again, would it necessarily follow, even if radical ideas were destructive of all specific ecclesiastical organization, that they are a destructive element in general society. If true, they must in some way and ultimately be constructive. And though it should be admitted that they tend to overthrow all special and separate religious institutions, it may be claimed for them that they do it in order to embody religious ideas in the whole of human society and life.

But it is not our present purpose to follow this line of argument. We are not now concerned to reply to those critics of radical ideas who measure the advance of a cause by the outward sectarian standard of large assemblies and prosperous organizations. Our word here is rather to those who believe in Radicalism in religion. We think that the failure of the free churches has a lesson which radicals have yet to learn.

As already said, we are ready to admit that radical ideas are antagonistic to the ordinary form of church organization and ministration in Christendom. And we believe that the free churches have so generally failed because they have conformed so nearly to the old form of church organization. The ordinary plan and administration of the Christian Church grew out of ideas which Radicalism sets aside. The consecrated edifice, regarded as specially holy and specially set apart for religious services; the consecrated day, holier than other days and to be devoted to worship; the conception of worship as a presentation of the body as well as soul to the Divine Being at some specific holy place and time, and of rendering homage to Him by joining in acts of public prayer and praise, and by listening to the reading and interpretation of His word; the acceptance of the Bible as His specific, miraculously given word, to be received as an infallible standard of faith and duty; the belief that the minister is specially called and consecrated, and set apart by the laying on of sacred hands, to be the interpreter of the truths of this book to the congregation; and the belief that Jesus, the historical Head of the church, is still its living Head, and is in some mystical way still present with it in all its branches and places of worship, and that the members of the church, through the ordinances of baptism and communion, are united with him in a closer and more saving fellowship than are other persons,—these are the ideas out of which the prevailing ecclesiastical organization and form of service in Protestant Christendom have grown. Now Radicalism tends to subvert or very essentially to revise every one of these ideas. It does not see anything in a church edifice more holy than in the dwelling-place of a family; knows no special holy day nor hour, but would make all time holy; declares true thought and feeling and action, wherever they are, to be the best worship; regards the Bible as only a part, and an imperfect part, of the Divine Word, whose full utterance is to be found in all nature and in all humanity; holds the minister at best to be but a simple man among men, speaking earnestly and from the heart, and with all possible help of culture, his deepest convictions of truth and duty, which his hearers, however, are to judge by their own equally free reason; classes Jesus with the prophets, who have been in all ages and nations teachers and leaders of mankind, yet have no other authority than that which inheres in the truth they have taught.

But, though Radicalism has proclaimed a set of religious ideas so different from those on which the old church organization is based, the churches which it has attempted to form have been modelled generally, except in the matter of allowing a larger freedom of opinion, and of giving up the ordinances of baptism and communion, nearly upon the old plan. The one great object is to provide for the Sunday service. A church or hall is secured specially for that, and a minister is secured permanently to conduct it. The order of service is usually the routine that is common in the old churches of the Congregational order. Perhaps there are also the customary adjuncts of the old church—the Sunday School and the Sewing-circle, though very likely in feebler form. And little or nothing more is attempted. Now such an organization with Radicalism is necessarily weak, because it has beneath it none of the ideas from which it originally sprang, and which in the Christian church still nourish it. In a radical religious society thus organized there is really very little to hold it together, except the ability of the preacher and the bond of personal attachment that is formed between him and the society. Hence, if the preacher dies or withdraws, or does not prove himself sufficiently able, such a society is very apt to go to pieces, as we might naturally expect it would. Sometimes a free society is formed solely to give a preacher a hearing who has been cast out of some Christian church for uttering heretical convictions. Theodore Parker's society was organized on the resolve of a few gentlemen, stirred up by the sectarian attempts to silence him, "that Theodore Parker should be heard in Boston." And all this is well. And there need be no surprise if such societies should die with their preachers. Indeed, if radicalism is to have no other form of organization than this feeble copy of the old ecclesiastical plan, then we should say that it would be more consistent with the radical idea, that every preacher should gather his own society according to the power of his word to attract and hold, and that, dying, his organization should die with him, leaving the members of his congregation free to be drawn again to whatsoever voice can speak to their individual needs. That would be the prophetic plan of religious administration in distinction from the ecclesiastical and priestly. And the essential effect of such a plan must be secured in any organization of Radicalism.

But we are convinced that Radicalism is to have some other form of religious organization than this pencilled copy of the old Congregational mechanism. The general failure of the free churches is but the natural bursting of the old bottles from the strength of the new wine. The radical faith, so different from the faith on which the churches of Christendom are built, must adopt new methods. Radical ideas must find some form of organization conformable to their own demands,—an organization immediately practical, yet free, elastic, and capable of expansion to suit their own growth. Such an organization, we think, is coming. Next week we shall try to indicate some of the features which, as it seems to us, will distinguish it.

A VOW FROM A BUDDHISTIC LITURGY.

The following vow from a Chinese book of worship is commended to the thoughtful attention of Evangelical Christendom. Compare it with the doctrine which some Christian preachers have taught, that the happiness of the redeemed in heaven is enhanced by their looking down upon the misery of the damned:—

O Thou Great-Compassionate-Heart, never will I seek, nor receive, private, individual salvation,—never enter into final peace alone; but for ever and everywhere will I live and strive for the universal redemption of every creature, throughout all worlds. Until all are delivered, never will I leave the world of sin, sorrow and struggle, but will remain where I am.

NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

Emerson, in "Society and Solitude," thus expresses himself towards all sensationalism:—"I hate the shallow Americanism which hopes to get rich by credit, to get knowledge by raps on midnight-tables, skill without study, mastery without apprenticeship, power through a packed jury or caucus, or wealth by fraud. They think they have got it, but they have got something else—a crime, which calls for another crime, and another devil behind that; these are steps to suicide, infamy, and the harming of mankind. In this life of show, puffing, advertisement and manufacture of public opinion, all excellence is lost sight of in the hunger for sudden performance and unearned praise."

Swift proposed to put a tax on female beauty, and to leave every lady to rate her own charms. He said the tax would be cheerfully paid, and would be very productive.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

RELIGIOUS REVIVALS.

[The Eighth Free Lecture read in City Hall, Dover, N. H., Sunday evening, March 14, 1869. Reprinted from the Dover Gazette of March 26.]

Many years ago, while still a boy, I went to see a great spectacular drama at the Boston Museum. It closed with a grand tableau—spirits and genii floating on clouds, and the queen of the fairies descending in her magic car. There was a profuse display of gay colors, gilding, and glass jewels, which, in the more distant parts of the amphitheatre, must have been imposing in a high degree; but unfortunately my seat was in the foreground, and I well remember my disappointment at seeing so much of the stage machinery. Although my imagination was tolerably active, the illusion of floating clouds and fairy chariot was dispelled by a net-work of very unmistakable ropes and wires. The spell of enchantment was rudely broken by coming too near.

The "revival" which has so lately swept over our city, and is now subsiding like a spent wave, has "revived" nothing in my mind quite so effectually as this boyish experience. Looked at from a respectful distance, it doubtless appeared a solemn exhibition of Divine grace. But looked at from a closer point of view, it appeared, at least to some observers, a somewhat bungling display of human mechanism. Far be it from me to question the reality or sincerity of feelings which in many cases, I doubt not, gushed up from the depths of the soul; but, viewed as a whole, the revival appears to me to have been produced by turning an ecclesiastical crank, and managed by ecclesiastical ropes and wires. The mechanism was altogether too plain.

Have we indeed beheld a "special outpouring of the Holy Ghost," or only a special outpouring of proselyting zeal? The church, like every other organization dependent on popular support, has a keen appetite for new members; and, like political parties, secures them by employing skilful stump-speakers. I see nothing special or supernatural in all this; I see no miracle at all, but merely the ordinary means adopted by secular organizations. By repeated and well-dealt blows, any popular audience can be beaten up, like an egg, into a froth; but when left to itself, the froth soon dies away. An egg beaten up into froth weighs precisely what it weighed before; and so a crowd, lashed into excitement, weighs precisely what it weighed before. The beating process imparts no weight—no religion; it imparts froth, and nothing more. Revivalists affect to treat revivals as brought about by supernatural influences; but they never trust these. They must set in motion all the ecclesiastical machinery, or they know that their efforts will end in the froth they create. Hence they labor so hard to make impressive listeners commit themselves before the fever passes away,—to make them come forward immediately to the "anxious seats," or stand up for prayers, or perform some other act which publicly commits them as converts. No time is allowed for calm reflection—they must act at once, or run the risk of losing their souls forever. Is it any wonder that persons of impressive temperaments yield to the delirious emotions of the hour, and blindly obey? Church members may call this a "special outpouring of the Holy Ghost,"—I call it a special outpouring of mesmeric power. The wild enthusiasm thus created is froth—not religion; and no one knows better than the revivalist that, if the enthusiasm does not at once culminate in the act of public profession, it will end, like all froth, in nothing at all. Hence all his efforts converge towards a single object—the persuasion of multitudes to join the church.

This is the objective point of the campaign; and while there is doubtless, in the chief actors, more or less of sincere and disinterested zeal for the salvation of souls, it is impossible not to see, conjoined with this, a much less disinterested zeal for the material welfare of a corporation. These two motives are blended, perhaps indistinguishably, in the mind of the revivalist; and the one may seem to hallow the other. But the over-great anxiety he manifests to secure the outward profession of religion, betrays the excess of the ecclesiastical above the religious spirit. In the stress thus laid on the mere act of outward profession, we see the arts of the recruiting-sergeant, who marches through the town with drum and fife and flying colors, in order to arouse the martial spirit, and thus secure immediate enlistments. Once enlisted, there is no escape. So revivals have been reduced to a regular system, with the primary aim of raising recruits for the churches; and it is nearly as hard to escape from the church as from the army. True, the army has its deserters, while the church has its "backsliders"; but the odium attached to desertion and "backsliding" keeps thousands in a conscious bondage. If, therefore, revivalists forbore to practise the arts of the recruiting-sergeant—forebore to make the church a trap for the unwary by playing on their weaknesses,—they would show only a becoming faith in their claim that revivals are "special outpourings of the Holy Ghost." But how is it possible to respect this claim, when we see them putting into operation all the ingenuity of human shrewdness, and thus betraying a secret distrust of the sufficiency of the Holy Ghost? Certain it is, that by this manifest anxiety to lengthen the roll of church-membership, they in many cases defeat their own ends, and turn religion into a farce.

So far as revivals really tend to promote the cause of religion,—so far as they really help men to become better,—I have nothing but sympathy for them, nothing but words of encouragement and hearty endorsement. In some cases I know that permanent good is done. The transient excitement occasionally deepens into a fixed purpose of leading a holier life, and thus elevates and ennobles character. Wherever this result follows, God forbid that I should withhold my word of sincerest sympathy, or fail to lend a helping hand. But who is ignorant of the exceeding fewness of such cases? The method is bad, radically bad, because the end is wrong. Men commonly succeed in what they earnestly undertake; and because revivalists are in earnest about making church-members, they commonly succeed in this. But they commonly fail to make better men and women, because they do not strive for this with the same earnestness. The average of character among church-members is not one whit higher than the average of character among outsiders. When it is said by revivalists, as was said in this very hall only a few weeks ago, that "a good, moral man out of Christ had a worse influence over his children than a drunkard," can we wonder that character is less esteemed in the church than mere faith in Christ? What is this but to set sanctimony above righteousness in the church, and pour contempt on honest goodness out of the church? From the very depths of my heart I protest against such moral infidelity. I believe I pass with some of you for a heretic; but I would rather die than utter such a heresy as this. Neither can I hold my peace when others, with fanatical and mistaken zeal, thus sap the foundations of human reverence for the moral law. Whatever falsehoods and follies I may wish to expose, every word that I have ever spoken, or will ever speak, aims to deepen and strengthen and consecrate the love of simple goodness for its own sake. Others may preach Christ,—let me preach conscience! Surely, I may well rub my eyes as if half asleep to find myself "denouncing heresy;" but whoever sneers at natural morality, or seeks to transfer man's supreme allegiance from truth and rectitude and goodness to some imaginary Savior, strikes a blow at my religion. I have no dogmas, no doctrines, to defend; but I have a deep faith in spiritual holiness which is dearer to me than life,—holiness that floats before our spiritual eyes as the divinely revealed ideal, the beatific vision of indwelling God, and that needs no sanction or enforcement from Bibles or Christs. To this inward law of purity, of integrity, of moral courage, I would do my feeble best to point all eyes and attach all hearts; and it is because revivals tend to avert attention from this inward law, the true revelation of God to every soul, towards a mere "will o' the wisp," that I have felt moved to say a few plain words about them.

The eagerness to win proselytes and thus swell the churches, of which I have spoken as the primary object of all revivals, was painfully evident in the revival just past. Little children, wholly unable to comprehend what they were about, were persuaded to enter the charmed circle of "anxious seats;" and here I saw some secretly laughing and playing, while bending their heads and covering their faces with their handkerchiefs during public prayer. What is this but to receive a first lesson in the school of hypocrisy? It was to me a saddening, a sickening sight. The wound thus dealt to the most sacred instincts of their nature is perhaps incurable. The little ones did not seem to me to have been brought to the feet of Jesus, but to have been "passed through the fire to Moloch." Of course it was intended only to make Christians of them; but for one Christian there will be nine hypocrites developed. How can it be otherwise at their tender age? The exuberance of childish glee will be henceforth repressed as unworthy of their serious "profession;" a reaction will set in, and demure hypocrisy or open rebellion will be the result in most cases. Let us trust that better motives caused their immolation than mere ambition to swell revival statistics.

Of those adult persons who came forward for prayer, I speak advisedly when I say that some were actually teased into the "anxious seats." Many went there of their own free will, because profoundly moved by the fervent appeals they heard; but others were almost coerced by the unwearied importunity of "working Christians." In the words of one,— "I did not go, I was sent." All who declined to enter the seats reserved for "inquirers" were directly or indirectly represented as resisting the Holy Spirit, yielding to the seductions of a subtle spiritual pride, etc. One young lady made a striking answer to the leader of the revival. "Do you refuse to go because you have too much pride?" "No!" was her reply, "I have not pride enough!" Those who reflect without bias or prejudice will see the force and significance of this reply. The ancient pretension of the Jewish nation to be the "chosen people of God," disowned by liberal Hebrews of to-day, has been inherited by the Christian church, which is avowedly composed of the "elect" or "chosen ones of God." The distinction between Jew and Gentile was abolished by Christianity, but only to make room for that subtler distinction of "elect and reprobate," "converted and unconverted." The same exclusive favor of God which was claimed by the Jews on national grounds, is claimed to-day by Christians on personal grounds; and thus the common Father of us all is made an arbitrary, partial, and unjust parent. The "converted" soul is supposed among Christians to be rescued from hell, not because of its own goodness, but by the free grace of God, moving it by special divine influences to accept the terms of salvation. Under the guise of spiritual humility is thus fostered the most dangerous species of spiritual pride; and the young lady showed surprising penetration when she said, as her reason for not coming forward, that she "had not pride enough." Does it not imply great pride to believe that we have been singled out by God as recipients of his partial favor? The radical, claiming no such partial favor, is more humble than the Christian with his ecclesiastical patent of nobility.

This pride of conversion was very evident to me in the very assumption made by the revivalists, that all who were not Christians must be conscious of fighting against God. Mr. Durant himself, whose earnestness, consistency, and intense faith in his own ideas commanded my sincerest admiration, made this accusation against the unconverted with great energy, declaring them all to be aware in their own hearts that they were at enmity with God. Hence he felt us to be in extreme peril, and manifestly yearned to rescue here and there a "brand from the burning." If all Christians were as honest and as earnest as he, they would all do as he is doing,—give up business and pleasure wholly to save their fellow-men from hell. There is no insanity in his religion—it is only an honorable fidelity. If his fellow-Christians had half his faith and devotion, they would all take up the same trade; for no decent man, not to say Christian, would be able to carry on his pursuit of wealth or position, if in his secret heart he believed all his neighbors to be in such appalling danger. Mr.

Durant, with his one idea and whole-souled devotion to it, is a living and withering rebuke to his lukewarm fellow-believers. But this fact does not neutralize the fact of his fanaticism. His zeal is not according to knowledge, and is a melancholy instance of misdirected enthusiasm. Believing himself saved, moreover, by the special grace of God, how is it possible that no spiritual pride should manifest itself in his exhortations? Pride is simply the looking-down on others; and the converted Christian cannot but look down on all the unconverted, even while longing to raise them to his own elevation. No Christian can cherish the modest, radical reverence for all men, as standing before God on precisely the same level, and loved by him with impartial and equal love. The Christian must feel that, while he himself has made his peace with God by throwing himself unreservedly at the feet of Jesus, all the unconverted are consciously at enmity with him.

During one of the evening meetings, a minister came to me, evidently hoping that my heart was touched by the appeals I had heard, and kindly desiring to give me a welcome into the church, if I would come. I hope I met him in the same spirit. Said he, "How are you pleased with the meeting?" "I am much interested," was my answer. "Are you a Christian?" he asked. "No," I replied. "Don't you want to be a Christian?" he then inquired. If I had answered either yes or no to this question, I knew he would not understand me; and, desiring to answer what I supposed to be the essence of it, I replied,—"My heart is at peace with God,—though not in your way." "Oh!" he said, and withdrew. I doubt whether he, or any other Christian, can understand how an unconverted man can feel his heart at peace with God; but no man, honestly striving to do his duty in manly fashion, and thus to obey the law of God in his own soul, can really be at war with him. We are never at enmity with God, unless we are at enmity with ourselves; and he who is at peace with himself, is at peace with God and with man. If by our own faults we find ourselves at war with ourselves, there is no salvation outside of us; we must suffer, until we are willing to respect our violated natures, and learn to do well. A spasm of love for Jesus will not make our weak wills strong, or our neglected consciences healthy; faithful endeavors long continued are the only exit out of base habits or unworthy characters. But in this work of self-correction and self-improvement, we may know that God is with us at every step; every force in the universe becomes our friend in the effort to be true to our own nature. How then, can we, even if not saints or heroes, feel ourselves to be at enmity with God? We are trying, at least, to be in harmony with all goodness and truth; we cannot, therefore, be out of harmony with God.

Friends, there is no need of all this revival madness. The way to peace is one, straight, simple. Be in your own soul what you can yourself respect,—and never fear that God will then despise, abhor, or condemn you. Determine to be manly and womanly; and unless God is a cruel tyrant, all is well with you here and hereafter. The object of life is to live well; it is here and now, not far off and by-and-by. To speculate overmuch about another world seems to me to have but little wisdom in it. Whatever that other life may be, it must be the natural sequence of this; whether we are here mean and base, or great-souled and pure, we must enter that life precisely as we leave this. But virtue can be no nobler there than here, vice can be no more detestable; and I care not to pry too curiously into the secrets of the grave. Enough that virtue and usefulness are radiant with God's own divinity,—vice and uselessness black with the deformity of Dante's fiends; and that to live well here and now must be the object of life itself. To live well here and now is, at least, to earn the continuance of life hereafter; and I am, for one, content with the earning of it.

No man is so weak or wicked that he must feel himself an exile from God. "It is a fearful thing," says the Scripture, "to fall into the hands of the living God." Not so! It would be a fearful thing, were it possible, to fall out of his hands. Hope and courage and aspiration are religion; despair is the real atheism. We all need the tonic of a healthy self-reliance; we need to be ashamed of whining over our sins as if they were incurable. God can take no pleasure at seeing us sprawl in the dust before him; he gave us feet to stand on, and it is making ourselves reptiles, not men, to writhe snake-like in the dirt. There is no piety in slandering ourselves before God, and heaping the ashes of self-depreciation on our own heads. If a thousand men cry out that they are the very chief of sinners, nine hundred and ninety-nine must lie about it; there can be but one "chief sinner." The one thing needful is not to sit at the feet of Jesus, but to stand on our own feet, and walk erect before God and man in innocence of heart. There is more religion in one man who is determined to keep his own self-respect, though he never crosses the church-threshold, than in a whole congregation of self-confessed "miserable sinners." There is no soul so utterly "lost" as the soul lost to its own self-respect; and whoever feels himself a "lost and ruined" creature, holds his redemption in his own hands. Up, brother, make one manly effort to be a man; and, depend upon it, God helps those who help themselves!

This is not what would pass muster as revivalist exhortation. Yet I believe it would revive something better than a gasping church. The air of all outdoors suits my lungs, I find, better than the heated carbonic acid of the meeting-house. The world must revive the church,—infuse into it somewhat of its own fresh and vigorous spirit—or else the institution will die. Revivals cannot save it. They become year by year more forced and more mechanical. There is something in the spirit of Christianity which fails to harmonize with the spirit of the age,—above all, with the spirit of this free America. That which is peculiar to Christianity is precisely that which most conflicts with the modern spirit. Revivals are got up systematically to recruit the church; the church exists for the sole purpose of saving souls after death; and salvation consists in attaining heaven and escaping hell. Now the process of salvation is very simple. First, the soul must realize its own hopeless state, lying under the wrath of God as a condemned sinner; next, it must throw itself unreservedly on Jesus as its sole and sufficient Savior. Absolute despair of self—absolute faith in Christ; that sums up the way of salvation. If we ask how Christ can save us, we are answered with the doctrine of the Atonement, the sacrifice of Christ which takes away all the sins of the redeemed. Instead of the sinner paying the penalty of his own sins, the innocent Jesus, the Lamb of God, takes the penalty upon himself, and thus frees the guilty sinner from it. To believe that Jesus can and will do this, is to have a saving faith in Christ. That is, a just God is satisfied by punishing the innocent and letting the guilty go scot-free. To illustrate the justice of this proceeding, the following story is often told, and was told, I believe, in somewhat similar form, during the late revival.

A boy at school disobeys some established regulation, and is brought to the teacher for punishment. He is sorry for his fault, and the teacher would be glad to excuse him; but the broken rule demands a penalty. At this juncture, another boy steps forward and volunteers to take the whipping instead of the culprit; and the teacher, actually consenting to this proposal, beats the innocent boy, and dismisses the guilty one unwhipped. The act of the brave little volunteer is brought forward as illustrating Christ's vicarious endurance of God's avenging wrath in place of the guilty sinner.

Now there is no doubt that the boy who thus stepped forward to save his comrade from his whipping, was a generous and noble fellow. But what shall we say of the teacher and the culprit? The teacher had his rule to sustain, and it seems he exacted a fixed amount of pain for each infraction, without caring who suffered it. When the rule was broken, somebody must smart,—no matter who. A teacher who should act thus in the Dover High School would soon be turned adrift as a cruel and unreasonable tyrant. The sentiment of justice is not satisfied, but outraged, by the punishment of the innocent for the guilty. The character of the act is not changed by setting the inflicter of such punishment on the throne of the universe. A God who could find his justice satisfied by this sort of expedient, would merit the scorn of every just being in the universe. But the case is still worse with the culprit in the story. If a boy in the High School should thus screen himself from punishment, and suffer an innocent playfellow to be whipped in his stead, he would be hooted out of school by his indignant comrades; and you and I would applaud the act. I do not believe so mean-spirited, craven-hearted a boy could be found in all Dover, as to slink from under the ruler at such a cost. To make out a case of heroism for one boy, the story makes a dastard of another boy and a tyrant of the teacher. And this is a fit illustration of the Church theology.

Is such a faith going to satisfy the future of humanity? Does it satisfy you? For my own part, if I should get to heaven by laying the stripes for my sins on Jesus, I could never hold up my head for very shame; the sense of my own outrageous meanness would swallow up all feelings of gratitude or joy. No—if God is going to exact such blind and aimless vengeance for my sins, let me act the part of a brave and manly person, and scorn to shield my own shoulders by skulking behind an innocent man. A foul character is not a soiled garment, to be stripped off and washed in some celestial laundry; it is a soiled skin, to be cleansed by our own private ablution. Sin was never yet washed out in a "fountain filled with blood;"—never yet laid on another's back. No—our sins work out their evil results in ourselves, at there is no possibility of transferring them to somebody else. Such salvation as the church offers leaves the soul worse off than before. If saved from its just deserts, what could save it in heaven itself from its own merited self-contempt? If we deserve hell, let us go there manfully; he is dishonest who would cheat even the gallews.

But worst of all, revivals encourage the most subtle and intense form of selfishness. Everything is made to concentrate on the one object,—how to save my own soul? The fear of hell and the hope of heaven are made to outweigh all other feelings and thoughts. The affairs and the duties of life are sunk into insignificance before the awful question,—what shall I do to be saved? Self first, self last, self all the time—could there be a more intensely selfish religion? "My own soul!" echoed Wilberforce, to some pious person who warned him not to forget his own soul in his labors for African emancipation, "I had forgotten that I had a soul!" That is the outburst of a noble nature, scorning to occupy itself with mean anxieties about its own future, so long as human miseries were waiting for alleviation.

Revivals need themselves to be revived, when looked at in the neighbourhood of such a character. Yes, friends,—character, character,—that is the word of emphasis. The real test between Christianity and radical religion lies right here,—which shall create the noblest character? Christianity, at least as we see it displayed in revivals, cares most of all for the next world, and concentrates all its interest, all its hope, all its affection, beyond the grave. Free Religion, with cheerful trust, leaves the future to God, and concentrates all its endeavors on making us better fathers and mothers, better sons and daughters, better friends, better neighbors, better men and women. It aims at founding human society on the love of God and man, and wastes no thoughts on future heavens or hells. It aims directly at noble character, unselfish service, pure lives, honorable dealings, perfect and manly trust in God's universal laws as also God's eternal love. Here is the test,—which faith shall make us more divine in spirit, character and life? I have an undoubting faith in a certain old axiom of geometry as equally true in religion. "A straight line is the shortest distance between two points." Christianity aims first at heaven, and only indirectly at character,—Free Religion aims straight at character. I believe in the straight line,—I have made my choice. You, too, must make your choice,—choose between the straight and the crooked path. But may we all at last meet at the goal!

RADICALISM VERSUS REVIVALS.

[From the Dover (N. H.) Gazette, April 2, 1869.]

As the readers of the Gazette are already informed, a marked and extensive revival of divine grace has been recently enjoyed in our city. While the union meetings were in progress, under the leadership of Mr. Durant, Rev. Francis E. Abbot, the avowed Theist, was an occasional attendant upon the meetings and apparently a close and respectful listener. He has, however, subsequently delivered a discourse in the City Hall, in which he makes a most bitter and unjustifiable attack upon revivals of religion, and this one in particular. In fact the discourse is a bold and defiant fling at the Evangelical System of Religion, and a labored attempt to present the alleged excellences of Radicalism in contrast.

It came to our notice through the last issue of the Gazette, in which it was published in full. Our first feeling on reading it was one of disappointment respecting its tone and ability. We had accounted Mr. Abbot a gentlemanly, high-minded and scholarly man; and we supposed that whatever his views were upon the subject in question, he would treat it in such a way as not to offend the good taste of any one. While on one hand it contains evidences that it is the product of a well-cultivated mind, it abounds in assertions, misrepresentations, distortions, and appeals to the lowest prejudices. The method throughout is loose and desultory, and the reader can scarcely rid himself of the impression that Mr. Abbot is doing just what he accuses the revivalist of doing, laboring very hard to produce froth, though the substance upon which he is beating is of rather an unsavory character. The same people would raise a shout over the doctrines he advances as would rejoice in the success of license and free rum. It sounds very strange indeed to hear him prate over the proselyting tendencies manifested in revivals, when, judging from the discourse before us, we know of no man who labors harder to produce an impression, or who exhibits more of a disposition to win others to his views.

It is not our purpose to deal with Mr. Abbot minutely and at length, nor to make an attempt to convince him of his error. The former would require more time and space than we have to devote to the subject, and to do the latter would be well nigh useless. There is but little hope of a man who makes but a single Scriptural quotation in an entire discourse on a Sabbath evening, and accompanies that with a flat denial. The Scripture says, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." Mr. Abbot says, "Not so. It would be a fearful thing were it possible to fall out of his hands." In this simple denial we find indicated his aversion to the Bible, its teachings, and the entire Gospel plan. Before we reason with him upon the subject of revivals, he must embrace our views of the Bible, or else we must embrace his. In order for two parties to arrive at the same conclusions, they must admit the same premises. The subject, however, has features of general interest, and we have duties to perform to the Christian public, and in the discharge of them we deal with the subject simply from the standpoint of the mass of the community.

As we have already intimated, we have in Mr. Abbot's discourse a labored attempt to present the alleged excellences of Radicalism in contrast with the Evangelical System; but to our mind the very exhibition which he makes of himself defeats his own object. In Mr. Abbot we have a man who has moved in good society, possesses a high order of ability, and has enjoyed the best opportunities for culture. Should we have expected to find the most choice fruits of Radicalism anywhere, we should have expected to find them in him. But what is the result? An avowed Radical for four years or more, and an avowed Theist for one year, his own words shall give the answer: "The average character among church members is not a whit higher than the average character among outsiders"—an assertion in direct contradiction of the teachings of history and experience. Pleading in favor of natural morality, he asserts, "I have no dogmas, no doctrines to defend; but I have a deep faith in spiritual holiness which is dearer to me than life—a holiness that floats before our spiritual eyes as the divinely revealed ideal, the beatific vision of the indwelling God, and that needs no sanction or enforcement from Bibles or Christs." It may, however, need an enforcement from Mr. Abbot, in order to have his meaning clearly understood. He takes exceptions to the Christian system, because it begets in those who embrace it what he calls spiritual pride; yet in almost the same breath he condescends to give Mr. Durant the patronizing compliment of being a man "whose earnestness, consistency, and intense faith in his own ideas commanded my sincerest admiration. But after all his zeal is not according to knowledge, and is a melancholy instance of misdirected enthusiasm." It would hardly seem possible for the Christian to make a greater display of spiritual pride than is here evinced by the Theist. Omitting passages which we would gladly reproduce, we come at length to what may be termed Mr. Abbot's ultimatum, in what he considers a prescription for all human ills. "Friends," he exclaims, "there is no need of all this revival madness. The way to peace is one, straight, simple. Be in your own soul what you can yourself respect, and never fear that God will then despise, abhor or condemn you. Determine to be manly and womanly; and unless God is a cruel tyrant, all will be well with you here and hereafter." And again he says, "We all need the tonic of a healthy self-reliance; we need to be ashamed of whining over our sins as if they were incurable. God can take no pleasure in seeing us sprawl in the dust before him; he gave us feet to stand upon, and it is making ourselves reptiles, and not men, to writhe snake-like in the dust." All this and more in the same hue, sounds strangely in contrast with the system which teaches that the truest exaltation is through humility. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted; and he that exalteth himself shall be abased."

Mr. Abbot, finding it in his heart to give expression to such views, is a marked illustration of the gross absurdities into which a man will fall when he has once broken away from the teachings of the Bible. It is the height of folly to attempt, by such twaddle and nonsense, to supplant Christianity, a system which has come down to us through the centuries, and has at each successive period not only won new trophies, but has also been strengthened by fresh evidences of its truthfulness. And never was the time when it had a greater number of adherents and was more potent in its influence than today. But it may be asked if Radicalism does not present a favorable contrast with Christianity in the examples which it presents of moral purity. We answer, most emphatically, "No." For it to do so is contrary to the nature of the case. Christianity aims at the thorough renovation of the individual through the agency of the Holy Spirit, while Radicalism teaches a gradual self-development; Christianity plucks up the tree, both root and branch, while Radicalism, at most, lops off only a few of the branches; and the former, as the result, produces pure lives in the highest sense, while the latter at most exhibits only mere the semblance of purity. Let us only compare the lives of such men as Paul, Luther, Edwards, Payson, and a whole host of departed worthies, who sought salvation through Christ alone, with the Radicals of the earlier and later times, such as Porphyry, Julian, Voltaire, Paine and Parker, for they all belong to same family, or those of experimental Christians in our own community with those of the adherents of Free Religion, and we cannot but be satisfied that Christianity is the only true system, and the Bible is the only correct rule of faith and practice. Or let us compare the civilization which is the direct product of Christianity, as that of England and our own country, with that of China and India, moulded by some of the fundamental ideas of Radicalism, and we cannot but reach the same conclusion.

But it may be said that the objection does not lie so pertinently against Christianity as against revivals, by means of which it is sought to promote Christianity. In reply to this we would say, far be it from us to quarrel with any of God's appointed means. The history of revivals is almost as old as the creation, and through their instrumentality has the cause of Christianity been largely sustained through the successive centuries. It is true that more or less excitement often attends them, and that some inconsistencies may be practised in connection with them, as may have been the case with the recent revival in Dover; but the blame in such cases is not chargeable to Christianity, or to revivals, but to the imperfections and frailties of human nature. The fact that revivals have been the instrumentality by means of which thousands have been brought to Christ and saved, is an argument in their favor which cannot be overthrown. And instead of the recent revival in this city "now subsiding like a spent wave," Christians are just beginning to realize the extent and magnitude of the work, in its fruits which are daily manifest. The abundant testimonies which we have, coming from hearts overflowing with love and gratitude to God, show conclusively that the work has upon it the seal of His approbation.

VERITAS.

"FREE RELIGION" MATURING.

[From the Dover (N. H.) Morning Star, April 7, 1869.]

Dover has had two rather marked visitations of late. They differ materially in character, as well as in breadth and depth of impression. One is a general revival of religious interest in connection with the labors of H. F. Durant, Esq., the other is a hostile critique upon the revival by Mr. F. E. Abbot, who recently cast from him, during a pulpit discourse, the names Unitarian and Christian, and who assumed in their stead that of Theist. This last mentioned step was a very proper one. Having rejected Christ as an authoritative and trustworthy teacher, honor required an avowal of his distrust and defiance. If he had only faith enough to be a Theist, it would have been hypocrisy to pretend to be a Christian. The wonder is that he should claim progress in thus going back from positive Christian theology to the mere germinal principle common to all systems of religion. It seems to us a species of progress like that of rejecting Paradise Lost and Hamlet, and taking the simple alphabet instead; or like seeking the best result of mathematics in discarding conic sections and the differential calculus for the sake of affirming the simple axioms in geometry. But it is not Mr. Abbot's theory of religion that just now calls for notice so much as his diatribe against revivals and the whole evangelical system, which he first uttered on Sunday evening in the City Hall and then printed in the Dover Gazette. And this utterance is important, not so much in view of what itself contains, as because it indicates the drift and momentum of the "radical" theology.

We do not purpose a full presentation of the substance or a review of the spirit and style of the discourse. It has too much length and too little method, too many assertions and too few arguments, to call for such dealing. And one can easily put a fallacy or a charge into a sentence which a column would hardly suffice to expose or disprove. Very moderate ability and very ordinary virtues are quite competent to bandy epithets and fling sarcasms. The fiercest accusers are not generally the moral paragons, and genuine sainthood is not usually measured by the yield of caustic criticism.

We only say, in justice to our convictions, a word or two of the performance. Concerning the author of the critique himself, we simply express our surprise and regret that the dignity, the scholarly tastes, the love of fair play, the disposition to employ thoughtful speech and discard the special pleading and clap-trap of the mere advocate, which we have been wont to look for in his discussion of high themes, should be so sadly wanting in this late effort. The discourse seems to us to exaggerate the faults and errors that may have appeared during the revival; it misstates,—not to say caricatures,—the evangelical faith; it accuses Christians of selfish motives and low aims in their efforts for the conversion of men; it declares that the world has more true spiritual life than the church, and so must save the church from death by an infusion of its own spirit; it quotes the Bible just once, and then to give it a flat contradiction; it charges Christians with spiritual pride in thinking themselves converted as others are not, and then boasts of the superior character borne by the "radical;" it declares that the ideal of the spiritual life in every man is wholly sufficient for him without any aid from the Bible and Christ, and then turns about itself to instruct and exhort the very men whom Paul and Jesus would only hinder and divert if they were to speak; it virtually ridicules the idea that God would come with help and redemption to such men as the publican in the temple, but announces that he will surely aid the man who defiantly scorns all undeserved favor and puts himself merely upon his own self-respect; and it more than intimates that the general tendency and effect of revivals of religion are to make the community more indifferent to real character and neglectful of the most sacred duties,—and much more of a similar sort. There are indeed some words that were put down with a measure of pitiful charitableness that savors of pharisaism, and with some approach to discrimination; but they do not neutralize nor scarcely soften the general harshness and bitterness that run through and saturate the discourse. Our impression is that there will not be found a devout and spiritual-minded reader of the critique but will be wounded by it in the holiest and deepest sensibilities, nor a godless hater of the law of the Highest but will hail it with a sort of reckless enthusiasm, as a gospel to ease an unquiet conscience.

The discourse exhibits to us "Free Religion" hastening into blossom and fruitage, and it carries with it the most effective protest and warning against itself and its underlying skepticism. That skepticism has reappeared many times in the course of the centuries, the same in substance, though now in one guise and now in another; but each successive form of it has found first a defeat and then a grave. There is no cause for anxiety or distrust now. The latest embodiment is likely to share the same fate as the earlier ones, while the Spirit that quickeneth the dead in trespasses and sins keeps on its victorious way. Like Julian the apostate on his death-bed, it will find, at no distant day, the confession bursting from its white and stiffening lips, "O Galilean! thou hast conquered, after all!"

THE EFFECT OF CHLOROFORM ON PLANTS.—At the last sitting of the French Academy of Sciences, a communication was received from M. Jourdain on anesthesia in plants. Some there are, like the common barberry, the stamina of which are endowed with irritability when an extraneous body is brought into contact with the lower part of the inner face of the pistil. They will then, as it were, rush upon the latter with some degree of violence. M. Jourdain, wishing to ascertain whether this sensitiveness might be influenced by anesthetics, as is the case in animals, placed a twig of Mahonia in bloom under a glass receiver with some cotton impregnated with a few drops of chloroform. The experiment was repeated successively for periods varying between one and fifteen minutes, the temperature being about 14 degrees Centigr. In every case the stamina were seen to bend backwards, as if under a tetanic influence, and their irritability was destroyed; but they recovered it in about ten minutes in the open air, provided the experiment had lasted less than a quarter of an hour, for in that case the twig dies and turns black in the course of a few hours.—The Herald (San Francisco, Cal.)

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"I tell you, your services are telling wherever known. But how to reach the great mass of people is the question. Your weekly editions should never be under fifteen or twenty thousand copies—one hundred thousand copies would but fill the requirements. THE INDEX should find its way into every section of our vast country. The friends should do it. I will be one of your subscribers who will donate five dollars for that special purpose.

As long, however, as people believe in the infallibility of the Bible, little can be done to clear the mind of its early education. John Stuart Mill might advance the most plausible argument in the world in favor of a truism, and the gaping multitude would stare him in the face, and say,—'Ah, that is against the Bible.' Consequently it has been admitted that Paine's 'Age of Reason' has done more to unshackle the mind than any other book ever published against the infallible authority of the Bible."

—"I have been travelling among the Hudson River towns for something more than a week now, and every day I meet human nature in a new form. It seems strange to me that such a large portion of the intelligent middle class should be so thoroughly fixed in the orthodox faith; but when I converse with them, my wonder ceases, as I find how little they think for themselves, and how thoughtlessly they absorb the doctrines of their religious teacher. They have their weekly (decidedly weakly) religious paper, whose statements it were rank heresy to doubt. I delight to corner such men, to overthrow their foundations, and leave them 'with a flea in their ears.'"

—"You don't know how much I prize THE INDEX. For a number of years I kept a News Depot and kept for sale all the publications of the day, and for the last ten years I have read or at least often seen most of the radical papers published; but none, in my opinion, has ever reached the highwater mark of freedom as has THE INDEX. It is rightly named THE INDEX, pointing forward to the grand republic of thought that is yet to be. It should have a much wider circulation than it now has, and radicals everywhere should labor to put it into the hands of every honest thinking person."

—"I don't think THE INDEX has been quite as brisk or as able as it was at first, since the hot weather came on. But the wonder to me is, how you have endurance to edit a paper at all, or do anything else, this summer. What a fine spirit, clear head and advanced position Palmer's letter of 1840 shows! It would make a good tract for general circulation."

—"Since subscribing for your INDEX, I have introduced it into one prominent family who belong to our Church, who have subscribed; and I shall get several more in due time. I wish THE INDEX could be doubled in size. It is the herald of the most advanced religious thought of the age. I bid you God speed."

—"Enclosed I send you another dollar for the next six months. I was a little cautious at first in subscribing for your paper, as there are so many humbugs about in these times. But I like your paper very much. Please continue to send it another dollar's worth."

—"What are we to do without the Radical? It is a sad pity that it cannot be sustained; but I hope it will be revived again after a little. I still enjoy your paper very much, particularly the address on the first page. Hope you will not, like the Radical, lack for patronage."

—"No. 32 of THE INDEX failed to arrive. As I wish to read them all and keep a file of the best little publication in the United States, you will oblige me by sending a copy of the above number."

THE GIFT.

She knelt beside the little new-made mound,
And rained her passionate tears upon the ground;
With clasped hands and broken voice she cried,—
“Would God, my child, that I for thee had died!
Would God the pangs that smote me at thy birth
Might smite me now, and bring thee back to earth!
A lesser anguish would they prove than this,
And be forgot in one sweet, living kiss.
O, when rough hands thy little coffin hid,
And tossed the heartless gravel on its lid,
The hollow sound pierced through my very heart,
And the death-angel slew me with his dart;
Deep in the all-devouring grave they thrust
My hope, my earthly joy, my heavenly trust.
Take, too, this living corpse that knows but pain—
Sleep, sleep upon thy mother's breast again!”

Before the wretched weeper shone a light,
Like the fair moon that dissipates the night;
And ere her faltering lips the silence broke,
The Shining One this pitying message spoke:—
“In the bright bowers of Paradise above,
The Father sought for thee a gift of love;
With His own hand He plucked a precious bloom,
Richest of all for splendor and perfume,—
Then in thy bosom placed the flower divine,
And in His own that fading bud of thine.
Alas, sad heart! couldst thou its beauty know,
Thou wouldst not frantically weep and call it Woe;
'Tis love's best gift, albeit beyond thy thought—
In Heaven we name it God's FORGET-ME-NOT.”

The vision passed; and, bending o'er her dead,
On the green grass she bowed her throbbing head;
From her full heart outleaped the prayer—“Forgive!
Father, to love Thee for Thy love I live!”

The Index.

OCTOBER 1, 1870.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also, an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

To correct a misunderstanding with regard to our recent “private circular,” we would state that it was so entitled to prevent its being published or publicly commented on by the press, not to prevent any private use that our friends may wish to make of it.

Among the “Communications” on the next page, will be found the first part of Rev. Robert Collyer's reply to Dr. Bland. It will be read with great interest, we doubt not, and the remainder awaited with impatience.

THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

The New Testament (James, V; 13 and 14) teaches that prayer will cure the sick:—“Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up.” On this promise Christians have always relied with more or less faith. The Catholics believe that the prayers of their church are sufficiently potent to avert the cholera and other pestilences. Orthodox Protestants inculcate a faith in prayer scarcely less extreme. There is to-day in the Black Forest of Germany an establishment conducted by Pastor Blumhardt, a Protestant minister, for the curing of disease by prayer. But the latest instance of this strange delusion that has come under our notice is the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the clergymen under his control, to add to the usual prayers for the sick and suffering a special petition “for the wounded, the dying, the prisoners, the bereaved, in the war that is now raging.” There is here, it is true, no explicit avowal of belief that prayer will effect any actual change in the condition of the classes enumerated; but this is manifestly implied, and no one will deny that it is the general belief of Christians throughout the world.

Now we do not feel at all inclined to ridicule the Archbishop's recommendation. We respect its motive, and the motive of those who comply with it, since we cannot doubt that real sympathy with human misery is the motive in both cases. But we see in this proposal to pray for the sufferers one of the countless illustrations of the manner in which Christianity defeats the true ends of humanity's best instincts. Christians believe that by offering such prayers they have actually done something to relieve the woe they pity. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they will feel entirely satisfied with what they have done, as a full discharge of the debt they owe their fellow-beings in distress. It is so much easier by repeating a few words to transfer to “the Lord” the task of alleviating such distress, than to spend their money or to take personal trouble for its alleviation, that a large proportion of the worshippers will go home from church with the comfortable conviction that they have fulfilled the duties of humanity in a most exemplary manner. A few will not be so easily satisfied, but will add to their prayers the substantial means of relief. Yet who that has watched human nature, and especially Christian human nature, can doubt that in a large majority of cases this offering of prayer for the wretched victims of the war will prove a complete substitute for the homely but effectual offices of real philanthropy?

If superstition stopped with absurdity alone, and did not thus practically cheat mercy and compassion of their divinest uses, we could pass it by with a smile. But because it is the thief of good deeds, and steals the fruits of man's noblest sentiments,—diverts the sympathies and virtues of the race into utterly wasteful and profitless expenditure,—it deserves to be hunted down to its death as a vampire that sucks the world's best blood. It blocks progress, it represses growth, it postpones freedom, it kills charity, it dwarfs mankind in every conceivable way; and, instead of being tenderly and delicately handled, it deserves no more pity than a wolf at your throat.

Though all the clergy of England got down on their knees, and prayed for a twelvemonth with the unction of a camp-meeting gone crazy, their combined entreaties would not do the work of a penny's-worth of lint. The prayers of all Christendom would not quiet a single agonized nerve, would not staunch a single wound, would not reduce a fevered pulse by so much as a single throb, would not count so much as the dust of the balance in the trembling scales that weigh a single imperilled life. Natural laws, view them as you please, are no more changed by prayer than by the puffing of a blacksmith's bellows. The courses of Nature do not lie at the mercy of human folly, but are shaped by a Wisdom that needs no correction, listens to no dictation, takes no hint. If that Wisdom be not also Love, you will not better your case by beggary. Ask nothing, but do your best. That is the upshot of true philosophy and real religion.

Prayer is powerless to change the natural course of events. Except as the simple expression of spontaneous sentiment, the outgush of a worshipping soul, it has lost all meaning in this age of the world. It is idle to expostulate with the universe, to seek for special favors, to pique ourselves on some supposed favoritism with Heaven; and it is worse than idle to throw upon Omnipotence the discharge of our own duties. He prays to some purpose who makes it his business to “answer” his own prayers. Whoever recognizes the universal obligations of humanity, instead of petitioning Heaven to care for the sick and the wounded and the sorrowful, feels it a sacred duty to care for them himself to the best of his ability. The German women of America, who, with the tender compassion of their sex, are now so busily bestirring themselves to provide whatever the sufferers from the war really need, will accomplish infinitely more in their behalf than the Archbishop of Canterbury with his chorus of priests, begging God to prevent gunpowder from exploding and bullets from hitting and wounds from bleeding and hearts from breaking, and thus answering the cry of tortured humanity with blasts of empty wind. When the needle-gun or the Chassepot, the cannon or the mitrailleuse, has sent its frightful missile tearing through flesh and bone, will prayer re-unite the shattered tissues, or mitigate the agony of the wound? Will it make the children of the slaughtered father anything but orphans, the wife of the dead husband anything but a widow? Will it put bread into the mouths, or clothes on the backs, or roofs over the heads, of those whose natural protectors have fallen victims in the hideous “dance of Death?” The sole good it does is the solace that may come from the sympathy it expresses; and this poor solace, coming from those whose tongues are nimble but whose hands are shut, may yet be turned into the bitterness that is begotten by mockery.

No—the world is growing sick of this stupid and most harmful superstition. It wants the substance, and not the form, of love to man. To him who is moved by pity for this awful wretchedness across the sea to pray for its relief, it says, shortly enough, “Pray out of your pocket-book, and address your prayer to the Aid Societies!”

If this prayer is not heard in Heaven, it must be because there is no God to hear.

The lecture in our present issue was delivered just after a very exciting revival in Dover, N. H., engineered (we do not think that word too severe) by Mr. Henry F. Durant, a lawyer of no small note in Boston, who had become "converted," and thenceforth gave himself up to the work of "saving souls." For two or three weeks crowded meetings were held nightly, most of them, we believe, in the City Hall (the use of which, by the way, on Sunday evenings, had been voted to us by the city council, but was cheerfully yielded at the request of the revivalists, though they had not the common courtesy to mention the fact in their announcements). After the revival meetings were over, we delivered the present lecture to an audience estimated at seven or eight hundred. It was published by request in a local paper, and drew out the replies which will be found on our third page. We give the latter without comment, as needing none.

One fact we noticed which we omitted to mention at the time. At the opening of one of the largest meetings, the evangelical ministers of the city congregated on the platform, and all knelt with great apparent reverence during the offering of the introductory prayer. But after Mr. Durant had concluded his fervid appeals and collected the converts in the front or "anxious" seats, and while, kneeling down on the platform, he was making the closing prayer, the same ministers, instead of kneeling as before, kept circulating through these seats with a most business-like air, paper and pencil in hand, to record the names of their proselytes! The contrast in their demeanor was so striking as to excite in our mind a sentiment very closely akin to disgust. Sincerity, even in superstition, we respect; but hypocritical pretence, the sanctimonious affectation of a reverence which is not inwardly felt and a piety which is only skin-deep, deserves no mercy, and will receive none at our hands.

IS THERE A GOD?

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT:—

I am deeply interested in THE INDEX. Last week I wrote of its editor—"Mr. F. E. Abbot is the coming man among Deists." I read your "Chaos and Cosmos" with no common interest. I do not always agree with you. I am a religionist and a Spiritualist; but have not found and cannot find your personal God. I am too sick, and in too much suffering, to write more than to be fully understood, and be sure I fully understood you. I am getting old, but hope never to be too old to learn. Let me take the "anxious seat" at the feet of your reason, and ask such prayers as you believe in bestowing upon all. I am sixty-one. Perhaps not one in a thousand, if one in ten thousand, has experienced so hard a life. Many have had a much worse life. I had an unusual amount of patience, physical and moral courage; but hardly enough to meet the draft on me for both. I think I have suffered as much from sympathy with others as in my own person. Both kinds came through no fault of mine. The first I inherited in my body,—the last was the natural result of my mental organization. Quite possibly, so far as my parents were concerned, I ought not to have been born. But there is or is not a higher responsible Cause of my being here, and being as I am. You believe in and call that Cause God. You write Him an intelligent, conscious, almighty, free, and "more than personal" God. You write Him Love,—and infinitely good. I see in nature, in man and beast, opposite emotions on witnessing and causing pain. I see these more or less everywhere, as truly in man as in the beast. If anything, all things and all emotions have resulted from that Cause,—hated as truly as love. Then why call the Cause exclusively Love? Where does reason justify this? I do not like to take away your God; but I cannot find the evidence of his being. Does your God sympathize—suffer with the sufferers? Is He indifferent? Or does it give Him pleasure? Does my pain give Him only pleasure? If the first, He may be exclusively good. If the second, He is without heart—without emotion. If the third, is He not fiendish? Now I beg that you will help us to understand your idea of God,—then point us to the evidence that such a God is. I can see no reason why a Cause which has produced as real evil as it has good, should be considered all good. You "take great comfort in the thought that chaos to man is cosmos to God." Pain is pain to me; would it lessen the pain, or make it less painful, if I could know that it gave God—my "heavenly Father"—only pleasure? Would it? You have seen pain ultimate in more pleasure; so have I, a thousand times. I am sure I shall see it do so again. This gives great hope to those who are suffering from pain. But it does not make pain pleasure, or discord harmony. It may make it probable that pain is a necessity. I faint would hope that pleasure is a necessity. Have you not known pleasure to ultimate in more pain? I think I have.

Fraternally yours,

AUSTIN KENT.

EAST STOCKHOLM, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1870.

[The writer of the above has been confined to his bed and chair for thirteen years, and has not been able to lift his hand to his mouth for eight years. Poor and old and utterly helpless, he is dependent on others for the very bread he eats; and this is very scantily provided. If he pretended "piety,"—if he should today profess to be converted from atheism to orthodoxy,—there is little doubt that he would find multitudes to exult over his conversion and to befriend him in his friendlessness. But he chooses still to be faithful to his convictions, rather than to buy relief at the price of self-respect. We do not in all points share these convictions; but we feel an infinitely deeper sympathy for the atheism which is thus brave and honorable and self-respecting, than for the "piety" which sees a wounded brother lying by the wayside helpless and uncared for, yet passes by, like the priest and the Levite, on the other side. Austin Kent's atheism has in it far more of the religion we believe in, than has the Christianity which condemns him for his honest opinion and neglects him in his need.

We do not wonder that the universe seems empty of God to one thus called to suffer. The miseries of a special case, particularly if our own, naturally tend to obscure the universal truth. We are not in condition to think largely and wisely on these miseries, until we can emerge from the harrowing details of the special case, and look upon the universe as a whole. Let us try to put the matter in a new light.

Mr. Kent believes in the laws of Nature as invariable and without exception. He disbelieves in miracles, because they would contradict these laws. In this he does but accept the clear teaching of science. But does he suppose that science can explain the natural laws governing every event in Nature? The phenomena of the weather, the rise and fall of temperature, the sudden outbreak of epidemics, and a thousand other facts that come to our notice daily, cannot yet be referred to laws clearly conceived and fully grasped. Why then so sure that natural laws govern these perplexing cases? May there not be here exceptions to law, i. e. miracles? No. Science is continually reducing just such cases as these to intelligible order, and discovering the laws that govern them; and the inference becomes more and more resistless that exceptional cases are only cases not yet understood. Mr. Kent attributes his own painful disease to natural causes, and rightly. But neither he nor any other man can tell altogether what they were. That is, he travels beyond the actual data of observation and experiment, and credits Nature with an absolute uniformity of law which he cannot prove.

Now this is precisely what we do in the interpretation of human life. The ultimate results of pain rightly borne are so clearly beneficial, manifesting themselves in higher and finer character than could otherwise have been won, that we cannot but refer pain itself to beneficence. Steel cannot be tempered without heating; neither can men. Whoever has endured life's hardships and troubles manfully, is conscious that he owes to them the very best that is in him; and this inward consciousness is confirmed by a thoughtful and profound study of human life at large. That the highest good is possible only through evil, seems to be a necessity of Nature; and if this be so, it is no violation of supreme beneficence that evil should exist. On a wide survey of life as a whole, we can come to no other conclusions; and we think it no more than reasonable to interpret all special misfortunes and pains in their light. However obscure may be the causes of a physical phenomenon, we unhesitatingly infer that it conforms with law; however dark may be the aspect of a terrible event in life, is it any less rational to infer that it conforms with infinite love? Looking back over the past, we can now see the good result of many things that at the time seemed intolerable; and we count it no superstition, but highest wisdom, to rise above the stings of present calamity into the calm conviction that goodness is supreme in the heart of Nature. Let us be as fair to Nature in human life as in physical phenomena, and give the benefit of the doubt to love, as we do to law.—ED.]

REV. ROBERT COLLYER'S REPLY TO DR. BLAND'S "OPEN LETTER."

CHICAGO, Sept. 20, 1870.

T. A. BLAND:

Dear Sir and Brother,—I have delayed answering your letter longer than is seemly, but I trust you will excuse this on the ground of much else to do. There was nothing in the fact of your writing, however, that in any way bound me to answer. You will easily see how a man so situated as I am could not possibly answer all the letters that all his friends could address to him, through all the papers that are open to them, on all the subjects wherein they differ from him or think they do. I doubt the propriety, indeed, of writing or answering these "open letters" at all. It is of questionable use. A man does his own work in his own way. It is supposed by those that care for him that he tries to do the best he knows, means what he says, if he is a minister of the truth, and does not mean to be misunderstood by anybody. If, then, some that hear him, or read what he prints, cannot feel that he is where they would be, or that he says what they would say, it is a question not of open letters, I think, but of letting him "gang his ain gait," as the Scotch say. This must also be why I cannot promise to write any more letters, if this does not satisfy your mind and heart. I feel bound to write this one because of the courtesy and kindness that is in yours, though I do not believe one word of what you say about the measure of my influence on the religious thought of this country, and so do not at all touch the questions you raise for that reason.

Your letter is of four things; my relation—

- I. To the Bible;
- II. To Christ;
- III. To Christianity; and
- IV. To Unitarianism.

You want to know why I regard the Bible as a book above other books; why I accept Jesus Christ as the Messiah of God; why I am willing to be called a Christian; and why I can belong to what you call the sect of Unitarians.

In asking these questions, you will observe you append to them answers of your own in every case; these, namely, that these four things are of a certain special nature whereby it becomes my duty to reject them, and not to be under the necessity of continually explaining my views, because I am placed by a tacit acceptance in a wrong position. I have no business, as I said before, with what you think I believe or ought to believe; that is quite aside from my special personal relation to the truth as I hold it. I shall therefore only state, in the simplest possible way, what my views are on these four things, and why I hold them; and then have done.

First, I hold the Bible to be of authority as a revelation of spiritual truth above all other books. I find in it many errors, many things that are not spiritual truth at all; mythical legends also, as you say, and things that are simply infernal. With all these things I try to deal truthfully, to call them by their right name frankly, as I would if I found them in an Encyclopædia. But beside this I find in the Bible such religious truth as I find nowhere else, and this is how I know it. This truth comes home to my own soul as no other ever does. The life and light of it seizes and holds me as I am not held by that of any other written word. I have been reading the Bible now about forty years,—as a child in the Sunday School, as a youth seeking knowledge, as an acolyte in the Methodist Church, as a Methodist local preacher, and now these twelve years as what is called a free thinker. I can only say this, that to-day I feel the force of the Bible truth as I never did before. It is perfectly inexhaustible, full of fresh surprises, and leads me captive with a far more wonderful masterhood than it ever did when I was bound to accept every word within the lids of the book as a "thus saith the Lord." That is my personal experience about the Bible. Then I have had the chance at a very wide observation among the poor and simple, in England especially, where thirty years ago there was such poverty as in this happy land is not known. I remember among these not a few that could read the Bible, or could get it read for them by their children. There were bits in it like "The Lord is my Shepherd," and "Comfort ye my people," and "Every one that thirsteth," and "If children ask bread, will He give them a stone," and "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him," and "By chance a Samaritan came that way," and "I saw new Heavens and a new earth;" scores of places of that sort where the old book would fly open of itself almost, so that it was no wonder, when they went to it, as they used often to do, and said, "Now I will open, and take my chance at the first passage that strikes my eye," that it would be sure to be some one of these wonderful living words that would set the heart throbbing with a great hope, be more than the meat and drink they could not get, and the rest that did not remain yet awhile for their poor bodies. I never saw the book that was to these simple folks what the Bible was through all their struggles down to their death. They clung to it, rested on it, held it as they prayed, and made it the closest companion of their life. I think they knew what they were doing, and I believe in my whole heart in these "primal spiritual instincts," shall I call them? My observation of these poor and my own experience are one. Then I know why they felt as they did, because I was in the same boat; and that is my second reason for the authority of the Bible. I find the last reason I can mention in the fact that the Bible is the master book of the master races on the planet. I know all that can be said about the poor or bad use they make of it,—how they “tear the book in fighting for the binding.” It is a sad sight enough; but there is a better with the bad. Where the Bible weighs most as a divine authority, there you find the foremost peoples. It may be cause, or effect, or both. I only know that there it is. Much more might be said; it would add little to my statement.

Now I think it is quite reasonable that the Maker and Father of us all should provide a book by his providence in which there will be a supreme spiritual authority, founded not on the say-so of Councils, but on the life and light, the truth and grace, of the things that are in it. It is not unreasonable to me that in the course of time there should be such Councils, however, to declare that this is the book in which men should look for the word of God. It is also reasonable to me that this book should be a mine in which these most precious things are to be found, mixed with rude and foul elements, rather than a diadem of perfect gems set in pure gold. We have to dig and delve for every thing of worth beside, to distinguish it from the worthless that is always somewhere about it,—the tare from the wheat, the flower from the weed. So we must distinguish here. That is what I try to do. Then, when I have done that, I gladly and frankly say, that there is no other book in this world of the authority to me that the Bible has. I think God meant it should be so, therefore it is so; and if there be in the world another doctrine, I shall have to be convinced of its truth before I accept it.

Next week, if all is well, I will take up one or more of the points that remain.

Truly yours,
ROBERT COLLYER.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE SUPERNATURAL DOGMA.

Having on a former occasion briefly treated of the fallacy of the supernatural, we would now follow up the subject by tracing some of the consequences entailed by the entertainment of that fallacious idea.

Our object is not the maintenance of a special opinion on a theological dogma; for a mere theory of the nature of Deity, though never so well founded, would be of very little avail without a practical bearing. Owing to the stigma that has been attached to human nature by mistaken Christian teaching, religious people generally have a dread of nature, especially of their own moral nature. They believe that everything of a religious character must come from a source outside of nature and independent of it; since God himself is a supernatural being, every religious emotion and observance must be hostile to nature. Than all this there could not be a more palpable error.

The Christ-idea is derived from these notions; for whether Jesus is viewed as the Son of God through impregnation by the Holy Ghost, or as the Son of God through being inspired by the Divine influence after he had been regularly begotten as the son of man, in either case, according to the Trinitarian or Unitarian belief, it is claimed that he was supernaturally endowed and that his authority was established by miraculous works and supernatural inspiration.

The Bible, it is claimed, is an infallible and plenarily inspired book. No matter how many contradictions and incongruous assertions it may contain, and no matter how many interpolations, errors in copying, and mistranslations it may have undergone, it is unscrupulously affirmed to be providentially and miraculously preserved intact. The Church is held as a supernatural institution, and all its sacraments are supernatural. Its baptism is attended with supernatural purification; its eucharist has a renewing influence on the soul; and the Sabbath is held as a sacred day of rest, though nature disregards it. So Providence in preserving and governing the affairs of men is not by law, but by an arbitrary interposing power. According to the majority of the people of the Christian faith, the very belief and acceptance of the Gospel is the work of the Holy Spirit, and is effected by the miraculous interposition of supernatural power. The priesthood, too, and the ministry are called and sent supernaturally, and all the success of their efforts is dependent on the effusion of the same supernatural influence. The very title of Reverend which these ministerial servants of the people claim for themselves, and which they accept with unction, implies—“Better than you,”—“I am in authority from God,”—“I am holier than thou.” These and a thousand other sacred things which time and space would fail me to enumerate, such as sacred music, sacred prayers and sacred benedictions, are neither natural nor rational nor dictated by common sense, but all are concomitants of the supernatural dogma.

If it is feared that the casting out of this Moloch from religion would loosen the restraints on our passions by freeing the imagination from that awe and mysticism which have always been conducive to the fear of God and, as is supposed, consequent obedience to his will; to assuage these fears, it may be stated that the human soul needs no mysticism or fear of God to induce obedience to his will. “Perfect love casteth out fear;” to see God without mysticism is to see him as he is—a being altogether lovely; and will insure love towards him and consequent obedience. If the human ignorance that prevails, and has been fostered by the marvellous, were overcome by light and intelligence, and men were more rational and in more intimate harmony with nature, the veil would be taken from their hearts, and they would go on unto perfection in the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

To free the minds from these misconceptions would be to place religion on its true foundation, and to save it from hollow mockery and delusion,—save it from its false positions and superstitious tendencies. Far from degrading religion or man, nature, and not super-nature, is the true, original, and universal director of the one, and the only safe instructor of the other. All that is good and true in the Bible, and there is much, is good and true to nature; but the intrinsic worth of this the soul itself must be the arbiter to decide.

BUDDHISTIC SCRIPTURES.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—I send you herewith a few sentences from one of the books of the Buddhistic Canon. This one is called the Dhammapadam, or “Footprints of the Law,” and most of its matter, although he never wrote anything, is considered to be from Buddha himself. It was found somewhere since in Ceylon, is in the Pali, one of the ancient languages of India, and was published with a Latin translation in Europe, by Dr. Fausboell, in 1855. It has also just appeared at London in an English dress from the hand of Prof. Max Mueller.

The volume as a whole is rich, showing a thoughtful, advanced mind,—one that has looked and seen, that knows attainment and possession, and dwells on the serene heights. Some of the passages may seem worthy to be incorporated into our western Scriptures, or rather joined with their better portions, to go to making up the richer and finer Scripture that is to be. The Bible of the collective wisdom of mankind, the really inspired volume, remains yet ungathered. But the time for it is coming; we are beginning to outgrow our biases and prejudices, to survey all books from the plane of the universal, and inspect them freely with a critical and impartial eye. In that larger liberality, justice will be done to the fine thought of the Indian mind, as has never even been attempted before.

“Mind is the root. Actions proceed from the mind. If any one speak or act from a corrupt mind, pain follows as the wheel follows the track of the ox that is drawing.

Mind is the root. If any one speak or act from a pure mind, then joy follows like an unwithdrawing shadow.

He who lives regarding the sensuous delights, not restraining his inclination, without moderation in eating, indolent and destitute of force,—lust shall easily overcome him, as the wind the fragile tree.

He who lives not regarding the sensuous delights, restraining his inclination, knowing to practise moderation in eating, keeping his virtue, holding his powers in full activity,—lust shall be powerless over him, as the wind against the rocky mountain.

Who casts aside his appetites, who keeps himself armed with virtue, well furnished with temperance and justice,—he alone is worthy of the yellow garment.

Who deem the non-substantial substance, and the substantial without substance,—they shall never approach substance, being full of false persuasions.

But those who hold substance for substance, and unsubstantial for unsubstantial,—they approach the real, being partakers of a true judgment.

As the rain breaks through the ill-roofed house, so passion invades the thought destitute of reflection.

Watchfulness is the path of immortality, slothfulness the way of death. The watchful die not, the slothful are as already dead.

These wise people, meditative, persistent, always with powers in full possession, attain to Nirwana, the highest felicity.

Whoso delighteth in watchfulness, fearing sloth, he is not liable to destruction,—dwells near Nirwana.

A man slothful, saying good things but not doing them, is like a herdsman counting the kine of others, but owning none.

As the bee collects nectar and departs without injuring the beauty or odor of the flowers, so the sage sojourns among men; he views their ways and learns wisdom from their folly.

Like the brilliant flower rich in color but destitute of fragrance, so is the speech of a man who practises not; however fine the words, they fall unfruitful.

As many kinds of wreaths can be made from a heap of flowers, so many good things may be achieved by a mortal, if once he is born.

The fragrance of the flower or of sandal-wood or of a bottle of Tagara oil is delicate, easily arrested, swayed by the winds, and carried whither they will. But the fragrance of the good, regardless of the winds, breathes over all lands and exhales to the throne of the gods.

As the lily growing from a heap of manure, accidentally cast upon the highway, delights the soul with its fine perfume, so the wise, disciples of the all-perfect Buddha, shine amongst the foolish and are grateful to the gods.

If the fool sits beside the wise man all his life, he will perceive the taste of the law as little as the spoon tastes the soup.

But if an intelligent man sits beside a wise one for a single moment, he will quickly taste the law as the tongue tastes the soup.

As the solid rock is not stirred by the wind, so the wise man is moved neither by praise nor blame. Well-makers lead the water whither they will; fletchers bend the arrow; carpenters bend a log of wood; wise people fashion themselves.

If one man conquer in battle a thousand times a thousand men, and another overcome himself alone,—this one man is the greatest of conquerors.

One's own self conquered is better than all other people; not even a god, a Ghandharva, Mara, (the demon of temptation) with Brahman can change into defeat his victory who has vanquished himself and always lives under restraint.

Who is free from credulity, knows the Uncreated (Nirwana), has cut all ties, removed all temptations, renounced all desires; he is the greatest of men.

In a hamlet or in a forest, on the sea or the dry land, wherever venerable persons dwell,—that place is delightful.

There is no fire like lust, no bondage like hatred, no snare like perturbation, no torrent like desire.

Anger is never allayed but by gentleness; this is the eternal law.

By kindness overcome anger; by good, evil; by generosity, the avaricious; by sincerity, the mendacious.

Speak the truth; yield not to anger; give, when asked, of the little thou hast: on these three conditions shalt thou come nearer to the gods.

Kinsfolk, friends and lovers salute him who, far travelled, returns home safe. So the good deeds receive and welcome the doer who goes from this world to the other, like kindred welcoming their friend.

If there is no wound in the hand, one may take in it and handle poison unharmed; so there is no power of evil for him who does not commit evil, &c. is inly sound.

He who is above good and evil, above the bondage of both, free from grief, from sin, from impurity,—him I call indeed a Brahmana.

He who, after leaving all bondage to men, has risen above all bondage to the gods, who is from every bondage,—him I call indeed a Brahmana.”

Csoma de Koeror tells us that he found in Thibetan books a passage which was designed as a resumé of the Buddhistic faith. The same is found frequently repeated in the Singhalese Sutras or discourses. “To abstain from all sin, to practise constantly all virtues, to maintain complete mastery of one's self,—this was the inculcation of Buddha.” The same sentence in substance is in the Dhammapadam. “Abstinance from sin, the doing of all good, the purification of the thought,—this was the doctrine of Buddha.”

Have we with our Christianity any gospel to send to those poor benighted, higher than this?

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavins B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Halliwell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

REPORT FOR 1870.

The pamphlet REPORT of the Annual Meeting of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870 can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, D. A. WASSON, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, F. E. ABBOT, SAMUEL JOHNSON, RABBI I. M. WISE, T. W. HIGGINSON and Wm. H. CHANNING. Price 50 cents. Also CHANNING'S Address on the “RELIGIONS OF CHINA” in a separate pamphlet. Price 20 cents.

CONVENTIONS.

The Committee appointed to arrange for Conventions under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, have decided to appoint Conventions this autumn in the West at Cincinnati, Toledo, and (probably) Indianapolis. It is thought now that these Conventions will be held the last week of October and first week of November, beginning at Cincinnati, Tuesday evening, Oct. 25. They will be attended by the President and Secretary, and other officers and members of the Association. Further particulars as to time and speakers next week.

FREE CHURCHES AGAIN.

We made some remarks last week on the very common failure of Free Churches. We attributed that failure to the fact that these churches usually have been organized too nearly on the plan of the old church organizations in Christendom. The radicalism preached in the free churches has nothing in common with the ideas out of which the old church forms have grown. Those forms were chosen and moulded by an entirely different set of religious sentiments. If radical churches, therefore, attempt to follow the old model, they will have very little to hold them together except the personal character and talents of their preachers. They are compelled by their very construction to depend upon this one element of strength. That failing, they fail with it.

But it is not, therefore, to be concluded that radical ideas cannot support any kind of religious institutions. The only proper inference is that the institutions should conform to the ideas. And we believe that radical religious ideas, at least until they have thoroughly permeated society itself, will have specific institutions of some kind; and any institutions that shall be a natural outgrowth of the ideas themselves they can sustain. What these institutions are to be, it would be presumption for any one to undertake to say with definiteness; for they must be as elastic and progressive as are the ideas. But we may venture to point out some of their leading features.

And first of all, the organization that is to be the church of free religion must be based on the interest of all the members. It is one of the radical ideas in religion that all true men and women, that are earnestly seeking to know and to do the right, are ministers of religion, and that there is no special sanctity or authority in the class of men who speak from pulpits over those who sit in the pews. Radicalism is hostile to the idea of the priestly office, and does not submit its opinions to a "professional ministry." Hence it must utterly eliminate the priestly element from its organizations, and very essentially revise the ministerial position. The weakness of free churches thus far has been that they have usually been organized around some one man as preacher. The strength of the radical religious organization that is coming will be the natural gravitation of ideas, drawing people together to join hearts and hands in efforts for a common object. The members will be moved and united by a vital conviction that radical religious ideas are of practical value to human society; that they are ennobling and saving; and that they are worth paying for in money and labor. Whenever this conviction becomes strong enough in any considerable number of persons in a community, it will bring those persons together first in a parlor, merely for free conference and discussion. But true radicalism cannot end in speculative talk. The same persons will be moved to work together, and with any others who will work with them, for practical objects of philanthropy. They will be ministers to the poor, to the suffering, to the criminal; they will try to enlarge the culture and improve the social condition of the community where they live; will be actively interested in all matters that concern the public welfare. For a time their members may be too few and their financial means too limited to attempt anything more in the way of organization. They may be simply a social club of earnest, truth-seeking men and women, strengthening each other morally and spiritually by free and sincere talk together on the highest themes of human experience, and banded together for any humane work that needs to be done in the community. The important point is that the organization is sustained by the common interest and activity of the members. And the Radical Clubs that are now springing up in different parts of the country indicate that radicalism is approaching this stage in the process of organization.

But these Clubs, if true to the ideas that originated them, will not remain in this informal parlor stage of existence. They will grow into more comprehensive and public institutions. Their means and numbers will increase and their methods be enlarged. The Radical Club is the nucleus of the coming Radical Church; only that word "church" is to have a very different meaning in the nomenclature of free religion from what it has had in Christian ecclesiasticism. The ideas of free religion being different, its methods will be different. The old ecclesiastical church might claim that its object is the same as that of the new free church,—viz: to make mankind better and happier. But though this be so, they differ world-wide as to the means. Radicalism claims that it is better to make men reverent of truth itself, rather than of any special system of truth; that it is a surer safeguard to cultivate allegiance to the voice of reason and conscience than to any ecclesiastical revelation or personal leadership. And radical organization, when its methods are perfected, must cover all the prominent radical ideas in respect to the means of moral and spiritual growth. Briefly, we may say that these ideas are, unlimited freedom of intellectual inquiry and opinion; culture; practical philanthropy; fellowship on the ground of a common humanity. The complete radical church must provide in some way for the organized activity of these ideas. It must be a body devoted at once to the free pursuit of truth, to public and private education, to practical goodness, and to social fellowship.

The specific institutions established for accomplishing these objects may vary somewhat according to local needs. But such a society everywhere will need a Hall or Building for its operations; if means allow, will very likely have a building of its own,—a building, too, that shall be as architecturally elegant and beautiful as are the old churches, though in a different way, and that shall be open for some beneficial use every day of the week. A part of this edifice will be an audience-room adapted to the public religious services or lectures; another part will be devoted to educational purposes,—to free evening schools or lectures for those who are at work during the day, to industrial schools for boys and girls, to a free Library and Reading Room; still another part may be appropriated to social intercourse and innocent amusements, open freely to the public, under the judicious oversight of a committee of active members: these, with fitting parlors and committee-rooms for the use of members in the discussion of ideas and plans and the laying out of work, would make an appropriate outward abode for a radical church. But all these, of course, are not absolutely necessary for the accomplishment of the ends of such a church; and the work must somewhat vary according to circumstances.

But will such a church have any one man as resident preacher? We think that it will, as soon as financially able; though, perhaps, it will prefer to call him lecturer, and will make an engagement with him as speaker for only a part of the time, leaving him free to make engagements elsewhere or to labor in other ways the rest of the time, while the society shall have the right during the same time to employ other speakers according to its pleasure. This plan has been adopted by the Free Congregational Society in Florence, Mass., (of which we gave some account in No. 37 of THE INDEX), and seems to have worked well. We think that great advantage would be derived from having a resident speaker. It should be assumed that the resident speaker would be a man of pure, strong character, of great ability, and of thorough culture. He may not have been trained in a technical theological school, but the more thoroughly he knows what has been achieved by human thought in all directions, the better. Such a man, or woman, of clear insight, trained in thinking and utterance and specially interested in the great moral problems that concern individuals and society, would be of inestimable value in any community. And so long as the great majority of people are devoted either by necessity or choice to material pursuits, and have so little time for thought or study, it will be greatly for the interest of society to sustain such a class of educated persons as special public teachers on the highest themes that pertain to human welfare. What teachers are in the schools, professors in colleges, lecturers in lyceums, these resident speakers would be to their local societies and to the community at large. They would raise the tone of thought and culture; and their judgment would be valuable, and their active interest and aid expected, in all measures of education and philanthropy. At the same time the radical church will not depend upon a resident speaker, and could even exist without one. And having one, it will derive additional advantages from reserving to itself the opportunity of selecting other speakers for, perhaps, half the time. Thus will it have the stimulus of a variety of thought and utterance. The resident speaker, too, would find such an arrangement to his benefit. It would give him more time for study and preparation, bring him into contact with a variety of audiences and afford him a larger hearing, and, above all, it would obviate the fatal necessity, which now presses so crushingly upon settled ministers in the old churches, of often writing and going through the routine of a public service when he may have nothing in his heart to say. If speakers were to be secured according to this plan, it would give opportunity, in the interest of freedom and fellowship, to invite earnest and able representatives of all religious faiths, the order of service in all its parts being left freely to the convictions and taste of the speaker for the day.

We have thus endeavored to sketch some of the prominent features of a Free Church, which, it seems to us, radical ideas will sustain. As stated last week, we have in these articles simply given our own view, and must not be understood as speaking for the Free Religious Association. We shall be glad to publish in these columns the views of any officer or member of the Association on the same subject.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, with respect,
GEO. SHARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y. Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world. 24m6.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

MARY AND MARTHA.

[Read to the partially formed Independent Society in Dover, N. H., July 12, 1868.]

"Now it came to pass as they went, that he entered into a certain village; and a certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house.

And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word.

But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me.

And Jesus answered, and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful, and troubled about many things:

But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her."

LUKE, X; 38-42.

Whether based on fact or fiction, this little domestic episode in the life of Jesus is, at least, natural in the highest degree; and, in either case, it will serve my purpose equally well. The two sisters who are sketched so graphically in so few words illustrate types of character quite distinct, the practical and the spiritual; and I wish this morning to offer some suggestions concerning them. The character of Mary is usually praised by preachers, while the character of Martha is usually dispraised in the same ratio; in fact, Jesus himself seems to have set the first example of this partial estimate, and a little unjustly to have commended the one at the expense of the other. If we can find in the brief narrative (waiving all historic doubts) any clew to the real characters of the sisters, I feel disposed somewhat to modify his verdict, and to see equally in both sisters good tendencies developed to excess. At any rate, I am as little inclined to praise the one, as to dispraise the other, without qualification. Both are thoroughly human, and interest me because human nature is everywhere and always interesting. Let me touch (not unsympathetically) on what I may call the weak point in each character, and see whether we cannot derive a little useful instruction from a peep into that modest Hebrew home.

Martha seems to have been the house-keeper of the establishment; and when the young "Messiah," whose fame was filling all mouths, turned aside to pay a visit to her household, she appears to have bustled about in great anxiety to do him all possible honor. Evidently she meant to be a most attentive hostess, and to do all in her power for the comfort of her guest. In the superabundance of her zeal, however, she overdid the matter, and, with the very best of motives, contrived to "bore" him with her hospitality. Too much fuss always spoils a welcome. It is pleasant to observe that the simple tastes of the carpenter's son made him wish to escape all parade and ostentation. He evidently thought that the kindest reception would be to avoid all formality, adhere to the common customs of the house, and thus make him feel himself at ease and at home in the family circle. The very worst way to entertain a guest is to make him perceive all the time that he is a stranger, and interrupts the smooth routine of daily life. Nothing happens oftener to-day than this very mistake of Martha's; and it is well to note in passing that, as one of the fine arts, hospitality depends on the observance of a very simple rule,—“Treat your guest as one of yourselves.” This is the secret of a perfect and delightful welcome; and while Martha was hurrying to and fro, putting herself out of breath, perhaps, to prepare a hot supper, and getting herself into a perspiration over fresh biscuits, it is easy to conjecture that Jesus was made uncomfortably conscious of being a visitor. Hence, when Martha, vexed at being left alone to do all the work, began to complain to him of her sister's idleness, and asked him to send Mary to help her, he somewhat bluntly told her that she was taking too much trouble, and that Mary was wiser than she. His reproof was a little curt, perhaps, but nevertheless wholesome, and contains a useful hint for all who wish to be truly hospitable. Cultivate simplicity. The real grace and beauty of a welcome lie in that unpretentious cordiality which is quite independent of hot toast, and forgets to apologize for a picked-up dinner.

At the same time, while acknowledging that Martha was a little too officious, I think that Mary hardly seems to deserve all the commendation she receives. Whether much or little, there must have been some extra work to do; and it strikes one as a little selfish that Mary should leave Martha to do it all, while she sat down to enjoy the conversation of their guest. I suspect that Martha would have enjoyed it also, quite as much as Mary, and had some right to feel aggrieved at having the whole burden of household cares put upon her. Suppers never come without being cooked,—dishes never wash themselves; and if the practical Martha wanted to do too much, I am afraid the spiritual Mary shirked her duty by doing too little. Doubtless, it would have been much more delightful for Martha to have sat down beside Mary at the feet of Jesus; but in that case they must all three have gone without their supper. In novels and fairy-tales it may not be necessary to mention such vulgar details as eating and drinking, fire-building, cooking, and washing; these can all be taken for granted. But in real life these bodies must be cared for, and they cannot be cared for without very prosaic work. Hence there is, at least, a question whether Mary, after all, “chose a good part” in leaving Martha to do all the drudgery alone. There was apparently some justice in Martha's complaint,—apparently some injustice in the rebuke of Jesus. Mary is always praised for her spiritual-mindedness; but there is no spiritual-mindedness in neglect of humble duty. The spirituality of the one sister seems to have gone as much too far in one direction, as the practicality of the other sister went too far in the opposite direction. These two elements, without either of which there can be no beautifully rounded character, seem to have somehow got separately embodied in the two girls; and unqualified praise of the one seems to be as much out of place as unqualified dispraise of the other.

In this simple story of Jesus at the house of his friends in Bethany, we detect the germ of that which afterwards became the worst feature of the Christian Church, and has continued to be such down to the present day,—I mean the fatal divorce of the practical and the spiritual, the disastrous separation of religion from real life. In the middle ages, a “religious” person meant one who went into a convent or monastery, made long fasts, did absurd acts of penance, rattled rosary beads and pattered paternosters all night long; while all who engaged in the useful toils by which mankind live and grow civilized were looked upon as “irreligious.” The chasm between the Church and the world yawned deep and wide; all the Marys were on one side, all the Marthas on the other. The same phenomenon exists to-day in a less degree,—although, thanks to science and secular civilization, the world is growing daily stronger, while the Church grows weaker. The time must come when the world itself shall become the Church, and when religion shall be seen to be simply the perfecting, and highest development of common life. Meditation, prayer, worship, cultivated at the expense of active usefulness, will appear to be what they really are,—a diseased development of spirituality, a luxurious indulgence of mere sentiment; while immersion in the material interests of life, mere work without ideas, exclusive engrossment with life's machinery to the forgetting of life's great ends, will also appear in their true light as a melancholy incarceration of the soul in mere things. Hence I look cheerfully to the decay of ecclesiastical slaveries as the first step in a great reformation of religion. Too long divorced in the thought and experience of mankind, the practical and the spiritual must yet be joined in a divine wedlock as complementary and equally essential elements of perfect character. Facts and ideas, prose and poetry, the intense activities of business and the refining influences of religion, will in the end cease to be sworn foes, and with friendly co-operation will develop the real in the ideal, and the ideal in the real.

But that day is, I fear, far distant in the future. Men little suspect that the Marthas and the Marys are equally stunted outgrowths of human nature. They cannot see how the spiritual man may be the most intensely practical, and the practical man may be the most divinely spiritual. Charles Sumner, working for great ideas with a wisdom and devotedness which posterity will at last appreciate, passes for an impractical visionary in the eyes of business men; Theodore Parker, laboring to identify religion with philanthropy, passes for a dangerous enemy of spirituality in the eyes of church-members. The world aims to be practical, and despises ideas; the Church aims to be spiritual, and frowns on the active virtues. But, because of this strange and disastrous blindness, the world fails to be practical and the Church fails to be spiritual. Faith without works and works without faith both end in miserable failure. It takes body and soul to make a whole man on this earth, and whoever would separate the two makes a corpse on the one hand and a ghost on the other.

There is something saddening in the contemplation of American life, notwithstanding its many hopeful aspects. Two tendencies manifest themselves which, I confess, appear to me neither lovely nor worthy of respect. One is the intense realism of the times, the worship of the visible and tangible, the greed of gain and utter absorption in material ends, which are such striking characteristics of modern society. Indifference to noble and elevated objects is the natural result of this feverish thirst for prosperity. Eager to grow rich, to get power, to rise in the world, people take too little time for purposes of generous self-culture or genial intercourse with each other. Men give up all their days and sometimes half their nights to business; women oppress themselves with superfluous cares,—multiply expenses and anxieties together, and deprive themselves of leisure and of means which should be devoted to better ends, for the sake of outshining each other in the world of fashion. We bear useless and voluntary burdens, and have no strength left for the cultivation of the mind, for the gratification of refined tastes, or for unselfish service of humane enterprises. The real elements of happiness are few and simple; and we sacrifice not only happiness but nobility of character, when we forget the spiritual in devotion to what the world regards as practical. In fact, the over-eager pursuit of material prosperity and pleasure, the virtual contempt of higher objects, which is so marked a feature of American society, is practicality run mad. "Things are in the saddle, and ride mankind." But great souls disdain this slavery to life's non-essentials, and seek to journey through the world with as little baggage as possible. For them, the practical is by no means identical with the material; and, turning their backs on the objects of vulgar ambition, they quit the arena of vulgar squabbles to enter on a higher and nobler warfare.

Quite opposed to this over-worldly tendency is the tendency to a false spirituality, which is a marked characteristic of the Church. The persons commonly regarded as "spiritually-minded" are those who join the Church, believe most strongly in the current theology, pray most fervently in public conferences, and groan most dolefully in revivals and camp-meetings. Nervous susceptibility, spasmodic piety, regular church-going, traditional orthodoxy, are too often mistaken for signs of a spiritual character. He who bewails his sins as the very chief of sinners, and declares his faith in the atoning blood of Christ, often gets credit for spiritual-mindedness, though his life may be coarse and selfish. I recently conversed with an orthodox deacon in Plymouth jail, who passed for a most illustrious instance of spirituality, in fact was regarded as a perfect saint, until he was discovered to be the perpetrator of one of the most frightful murders on record. The religion of the churches lays so much stress on certain doctrines, ordinances, institutions, forms of worship, and modes of feeling, that it virtually thrusts out of sight the laws and conditions of real spirituality,—pays tithes of mint and anise and cummin, and omits the weightier matters of the law. Much good as the Church undoubtedly does in its way, it makes earnest and thoughtful outsiders look on it as one of the chief obstacles to human progress and philanthropic reform; for it drains off into utterly unproductive channels the best energies and aspirations of the community. When hundreds of thousands of dollars are squandered every year in futile endeavors to evangelize the heathen, while so little is devoted to the social, moral and intellectual improvement of our own poor and degraded classes, one sees the enormous waste of good impulses and available wealth caused by the Christian Church. Instead of aiming to make the selfishness of the times give way to a large, noble, and humane spirit,—instead of laboring to make this world a paradise of freedom, justice, and brotherly love,—the Church holds up the salvation of souls in some other world as the great object of Christian endeavor, and thus poisons the fountain-head of human progress by turning spirituality into folly and religion into a lie. I know not which of these two tendencies to deplore most deeply, the low, sordid, corroding and false "practicality" of the world, or the debasing and equally false "spirituality" of the Church. To abide permanently in either, would be death to all that makes humanity progressive; and unless the material and the practical shall become truly spiritualized in our national character, our dazzling dreams about America's future must fade away like all other castles in the air.

He is the truly spiritual man who lives for spiritual ends; and he is the truly practical man who seeks them by practical means. There is no antagonism whatever between the practical and the spiritual, except as these are falsely interpreted by one-sided and ill-balanced minds. To be spiritual is to prize at their real value the things of the spirit,—to esteem the truthful, the chaste, the unselfish, the noble, the brave, the just, the loving, the holy, as above all price, and worthy to be made the chief objects of life. He is the spiritual man who seeks his own well-being in unselfish obedience to these divine ideas, and the well-being of his fellow-men in making these ideas the foundation of human society. With this supreme love for goodness and truth, justice and freedom, he transfigures all the material duties and pursuits of life with the splendid dignity of a great spirit; he enters the arena of business and politics, and shows by the grand integrity of his character that nobility of soul ennobles all things. "To sweep a room as in God's sight makes that and the action fine." The spiritual man or woman is the one through whose face and words and deeds there shines out that calm beauty of inward goodness which can irradiate the humblest lot, and make the cottager more august than kings and queens. What is it to be spiritual, but to aspire after spiritual excellence and strive to make it universal? What is it to be practical but to carry out this grand ideal in daily practice? Wisdom is but the sagacious choice of effective means to carry out noble ends; and he who is in this sense wise, is at once spiritual and practical. Martha forgot the finer meanings of life in her over-anxiety about its social forms and physical comfort,—lost the grain in too much attention to the husks; while Mary, by her very eagerness of search for these finer meanings, by her very contempt for the dry husks of duty which alone enclose the grain, failed to deserve the unmingled praise she received. There is no nobler task for the soul of man than to be faithful to the duties of the day and hour; there is no greater proof of practical wisdom than to keep ever in sight the high and divine ends of life, to sacrifice to these all lower ends, and to devise the best means of doing the best things. There is nothing so spiritual as to be truly practical,—nothing so practical as to be truly spiritual. Spirituality is simply faith in your own spirit, as made known to you in its highest commands; practicality is simply obedience to these commands, as directed by an enlightened judgment. Who, then, can afford to despise either? We need them both.

Miscellaneous.

THE BIBLE A FALSE WITNESS.

BY PROF. WILLIAM DENTON.

[A tract, published by the American Liberal Tract Society, P. O. Box 518, Boston. Price 50 cts. per hundred.]

"Thine own mouth condemneth thee."—JOB xv. 6.
"A false witness shall perish."—PROV. xxi. 28.

The Bible is probably the most contradictory book that was ever made. Written by more than forty persons, during a period of many hundred years, and giving the ideas of the writers upon a variety of subjects on which opinion was constantly changing, it is not at all surprising that this should be the case; but it is surprising that men can be found in this age, who declare, in the most positive manner, that there are no contradictions in the Bible, but that it is perfectly consistent throughout. Gardiner Spring, D. D., in a book entitled, "Bible not of Man," and published by the American Tract Society, says, "They (the Scriptures) uniformly speak the same thing; let their theme be what it will, the teaching of one is the teaching of all. . . . They never speak for and against the same doctrine; they never bear witness on both sides of any question; nor is there any instance in which they affirm and deny the same thing. That which, in reality, has any Scripture in its favor has all Scripture in its favor; nor is there anything in the Bible against it." In a more recent publication of the American Tract Society,—"God's Word Written," by Rev. Edward Garbett,—it is said, "We maintain, not only that Scripture clearly asserts, by implication, its own infallibility, but also that the claim is supported by the plain facts of the case." He also states, that we have in the Bible "a redundancy of proof that the words of human writers are, at the same time, the words of God,—as truly as if, from amid the parted clouds of his glory, our outward ears could catch his own awful voice proclaiming in the ears of mankind his infallible and unalterable will." Dr. Gill says, that, among the Bible writers, "there are no contradictions one to another, no jar nor discord between them, but all uniform, and of a piece." By such false representations as these, the Bible has been accepted by an unsuspecting community; and the most disastrous consequences have been the result. What are the facts? Let the Bible speak for itself. I will question it; and you shall hear the answers from this double-tongued witness. It has been said that figures cannot lie; and we will examine it first on questions in which figures are involved.

When David numbered the people, how many were there found to be? "And Joab gave the sum of the number of people unto David: and all they of Israel were a thousand thousand and an hundred thousand men that drew sword; and Judah was four hundred threescore and ten thousand men that drew sword" (1 Chron. xxi. 5). I ask the same question again; how different the reply! "And Joab gave up the sum of the people unto the king: and there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men that drew the sword; and the men of Judah were five hundred thousand men" (2 Sam. xxiv. 9). Any man can see that this refers to the same census by reading the connection. Here is a difference of three hundred thousand in the number of men of Israel, and thirty thousand in the number of the men of Judah,—a difference altogether of three hundred and thirty thousand. Which of these statements is correct? Are they both infallible? No man outside of a madhouse can claim that. Which statement did God inspire? It is not possible that a God of truth inspired both. What evidence is there that he inspired either?

After the census had been taken, God, to punish David for the crime which he himself had tempted him to commit, sent a pestilence, which caused the death of seventy thousand men. This pestilence, according to the story, was produced by a God-commissioned angel, who, when he had murdered the innocent men, "stood by the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite." David saw him, and determined to commemorate the occurrence by building an altar on the spot. But it belonged to Ornan, and he was therefore compelled to buy it. Now, infallible Bible, that "uniformly speaks the same thing," what did he give Ornan for it? "Then David said to Ornan, Grant me the place of this threshing-floor, that I may build an altar thereon unto the Lord. . . . So David gave to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight" (1 Chron. xxi. 22, 25). A large sum for those days, being, as near as we can tell, about three thousand six hundred dollars. But let us question this infallible witness again. What did David give to Ornan for the threshing-floor? "So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver," or about thirty dollars (2 Sam. xxiv. 24). Here he buys both threshing-floor and oxen to sacrifice on the altar when built, for one one hundred and twentieth of the amount first stated, and in a different coin. It is not possible that both these can be correct; and when the marvellous story is taken into account in connection with which these statements are made, it is very probable that neither story is true. They are rabbinical romances, that have been palmed upon us in the name of God; and a large portion of the Bible is no better. "It is a matter of little importance," says an orthodox brother, "whether he paid fifty shekels of silver or six hundred shekels of gold." It is a matter of great importance; for, if this witness testifies falsely of earthly things, how can we believe it when it speaks of heavenly things? If we had not possessed two accounts of this transaction, we might have believed either of them singly. And, where we have only one account of anything in the Bible, it is not presumable, that, if we had two, we might find portions of them differing as widely as thirty does from three thousand six hundred, and as silver from gold?

How many horsemen did David take from Hadad-ezer? "He took seven hundred," says this veracious witness. "David smote also Hadad-ezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates, and took from him a thousand chariots, and seven hundred horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen" (2 Sam. viii. 3, 4). How many horsemen do you say, infallible witness, who "never affirm and deny the same thing?" "Seven thousand." "And David smote Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah, unto Hamath, as he went to establish his dominion by the River Euphrates. And David took from him a thousand chariots, and seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen" (1 Chron. xviii. 4). If Hadad-ezer had only left us an account of this battle, this seven hundred might have dwindled down to seven.

Your friends say that you are infallibly inspired, so that it is impossible for you to lie, or even to be mistaken; and, in consequence of this, they believe the most preposterous things that you say about God, devil, heaven, hell, and so on, regarding which they do not propose to know anything save what you tell them. In order to show them that they are mistaken, I wish to ask you a few more questions upon subjects regarding which they can tell whether you are correct or not; and they may then see how much confidence should be placed in your word upon other subjects.

How old was Jehoiachin when he began to reign in Jerusalem? "Jehoiachin was eighteen years old when he began to reign; and he reigned in Jerusalem three months" (2 Kings xxiv. 8). Allow me to ask you again, How old was he? "Jehoiachin was eight years old when he began to reign; and he reigned three months and ten days in Jerusalem" (2 Chron. xxxvi. 9). We will say nothing about the ten days extra that he reigned; but if he had only been eight years old, he could not have been eighteen; and, if he was eighteen, he could not have been eight. These are strange statements to be made by an infallible witness.

One more question; How old was Ahaziah when he began to reign? "Two and twenty years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign; and he reigned one year in Jerusalem" (2 Kings viii. 26). I wish you to be quite certain upon this point; your friends already begin to quake on your account. How old was Ahaziah when he began to reign? "Forty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign; and he reigned one year in Jerusalem" (2 Chron. xxii. 2). How old, pray, was his father, whom he succeeded on the throne? "Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years" (2 Chron. xxi. 20). Then the son, who immediately succeeded him, was forty-two, and the father, just dead, was forty. Thus the son was two years older than his father. That will do, Bible, for one day. When circumstances suit, I will question you again; for these are but a few of thousands of misstatements that I know you to have made.

Did the Rev. Gardiner Spring, the Rev. Edward Garbett, Dr. Gill, and the Publication Committee of the American Tract Society, know these things when they made and published the statements that I quoted at the commencement of this tract? If they did not, they are too ignorant to write for the people of New England in the nineteenth century. If they did know them, then were they guilty of telling positive untruths; and we have in their statements a specimen of the lying done by Christians, and Christian ministers too, for the glory of God, and the good of souls.

SERVANT GIRLS.

[The following article by Mr. W. E. Lakens, originally published in an Illinois paper, has been sent to us by the writer for republication in THE INDEX. It is so excellent in spirit, and touches a subject which needs so much more touching than it gets, that we cheerfully give it a place in our columns.—Ed.]

There is no class of hard-workers so indispensable to the welfare of society, as that class usually called "servant girls." There is not one family in a hundred who do not find it necessary at times to employ this kind of help. In case of sickness, life is sometimes in danger without aid of this kind. These girls come generally from the poor, whose parents are unable to keep them at home, and are obliged to send them out to perform the drudgery of other households for a mere pittance above their board. The employer ought to be grateful for being able to obtain such help in time of need; but none whatever is manifested towards them. On the contrary, they are treated with more austerity, less kindness than is shown towards any other toilers.

They frequently leave their parental homes at a tender age—at the dawn of womanhood. It would be hard enough for these tender ones to leave the attractions which centre in a home, however rude, and go to abide among strangers, if the kindest feelings of our nature were extended towards them; but how doubly hard is their lot, when they find that, although they toil from early morn till late at night, there are no kind words, no smiles of sympathy for them. Young men who work for wages have their stated hours, eight or ten, with a rest at noon. These girls begin early, take no noon, but toil on till time to sleep. Their work, too, is of the most monotonous kind, the same routine of drudgery each day. But the mere labor, incessant and repulsive as it mostly is, could be borne if wages were paid adequate to the advantages conferred, and a feeling of Christian charity and kindness were extended towards them.

They are generally girls who have had but little education at schools, and but little acquaintance with the ways of the world, and therefore much need the protecting care of experienced and virtuous women. But unhappily they are seldom cared for. Their treatment is such as to greatly diminish rather than foster their pride of character and self-respect, which are the surest guarantees of morality and virtue. They are made to feel that they are menials, and the least assumption of equality on their part is rudely checked. The writer of this knows one who professes to preach in an "evangelical" church, who on one occasion shut the door of his dining-room between his dignity and a woman who was washing for him in the kitchen. This woman was a respectable and exemplary member of his own church. But she was poor, worked for a living, and was therefore unfit to eat a dinner with his holiness. Yet she had always thrown in her mite to support him in his pride and idleness.

We once lived in a small city where there were many who prided themselves on their aristocracy. Some of this class were wealthy, some only made a show of wealth. But all made loud and prominent professions of religion. When they hired a girl, it was to do their dirty work, and wait on the members of the family. She was kept as closely confined to the kitchen as possible, consistent with the proper performance of her menial services. She never ate a meal with the rest of the family—seldom ate in the same room. In almost every respect she was treated very much in the manner in which slave-holders used to treat their house servants. She was made to feel that she was an inferior being, as far as they could force this conviction upon her, from the time she entered the dwelling until she left. Under such circumstances she must have had an extraordinary degree of self-reliance, if her self-respect was not crushed out of her in a few months. Yet it was not uncommon for her to be by nature superior to the daughters of her employer. Was this doing as they would wish others to do to their daughters in similar circumstances? Jesus would say, "Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these, you have done it unto me." Who would not rather follow his young daughter to the lonely tomb, and see her quietly reposing there, than to see her thus surrounded by temptation, lonely in the midst of company, stung by mortification at every step, with no kind voice to soothe her when sorrow broods over her spirit, no gentle hand to guide her in the paths of virtue?

But let it not be supposed that we do not approve of young women working for wages. A reasonable amount of labor is useful for all classes, female as well as male. But we would have them kindly treated, not over-worked, and adequately paid. We would have them brought into the family circle, we would have them introduced at suitable times to the family company, and would have them treated as a sister or a daughter. If they are ignorant, inform them; if they are rude and uncultivated, exhibit good breeding in their presence, and politeness will come to them as naturally as breath. There is no danger of being contaminated by their grossness, any more than there is of losing your knowledge by contact with ignorance. Vulgarity is always abashed in the presence of refinement.

If you treat hired girls in this way, you will have the double gratification of having their services and of knowing that you have been instrumental in doing them good—in elevating them to a higher plane in society.

When this course is generally adopted, hundreds of young women will be glad to assist their neighbors in time of need, who now refuse on account of the crushing influence of a wicked public sentiment.

THE NINETEENTH CHAPTER OF LEVITICUS.

[By Rabbi Maurice Fluegel, in The Israelite, of Cincinnati.]

The divine legislator begins with enjoining holiness to his people. He then explains in what it consists: "Reverence thy mother and thy father. Observe the Sabbath day. Do not worship any deities beside God. Leave part of thy wealth, thy harvest, thy oil and wine to the poor and the stranger. Do not steal nor lie, nor deal falsely, nor swear falsely, nor defraud the rich, nor withhold his dues from the poor. Do not curse the deaf, nor hurt the blind. Dispense justice to all. Do not spare the low, nor respect the high-born. Be no talebearer, nor an indifferent spectator of wrong. Indulge in no secret hatred or revenge, but frankly expostulate with thy fellow. Love thy neighbor as thyself. Vex not the stranger, but treat him as one of thine own; love him as thyself, for strangers you were in Egypt. I am the eternal—this means 'Ye shall be holy.'" What masterly strokes of divine legislation! 3,500 years have passed over these statutes. Have they lost anything of their deep truth; of their genuine, intrinsic value; has any modern legislator, moralist or philanthropist added to it or detracted therefrom anything?

Has Rousseau or Kant, St. Paul or Huss, Luther or Swendenborg, added any new principle to practical morality? This is the greatest of miracles, the greatest proof of the Mosaic truth. Like an antique gem, in a golden ring, incased in a costly casket, preserved by a pious owner, even so shines forth from the Sacred Scriptures the glorious Nineteenth Chapter of Leviticus, with the golden rule—"Love thy Neighbor as thyself."

You have surely heard, my friends, of the narrative quoted so often in the name of Hillel, sometimes in that of Rabbi Akiba, and by some attributed to the Gentile founder. This narrative runs thus: Once a heathen called on the over-zealous Shamay, and addressed him thus: "Rabbi, tell me the essence of your sacred law in the time I can remain standing on one leg." Shamay, the irascible Shamay, felt indignant at the frivolous inquirer, and bade him peremptorily leave the room. The pagan, thereupon, went to Hillel, the mild and urbane pharisaic philosopher: "Tell me, Rabbi, the quintessence of your law in the time I can stand on one leg." Hillel answered, after a short pause: "Thou shalt love the Eternal, thy God, with all thy heart and with all thy soul." (Deut. vi, 5); "then love thy Neighbor as Thyself. These are the leading principles of the law; the rest is but comment and explanation."

Even so had I to formulate the essential doctrines of Judaism on the space of a nutshell, I should say they are:

I. To believe in God, one, spiritual, eternal, all-wise, all-powerful, all-kind.

II. To worship and reverence that only God with all our hearts and all our souls.

III. To love and respect our fellow-men without any distinction whatever.

And this religion it is, which is taught in our chapter XIX of Leviticus.

"MARY AND MARTHA."

On one occasion there was a gathering of friends at the house of the late Dr. Archer, of London. Among other guests were Dr. Harris, author of "Mammon," and Dr. Philip, of Maberly Chapel, the worthy author of "The Marthas," "The Marys," etc. In the course of conversation the question was mooted, which was the most amiable of the two sisters of Bethany, Mary or Martha? Dr. Archer immediately replied, "I prefer Martha for the unselfishness of her character, in being more ready to provide for the comforts of her Lord than to gratify herself." "Pray," rejoined Dr. Harris, addressing Dr. Philip, "what is your view? which of the two do you think would have made the best wife?" "Well, really," replied the good man, "I am at a loss; though I dare say, were I making the choice for myself, I should prefer Mary." Mr. Archer, turning to Dr. Harris, said smartly, "Pray, Dr. Harris, which of the two should you prefer?" The author of "Mammon" was only for a moment disconcerted, and replied in a style that set the table in a roar, "O, I think I should choose Martha before dinner, and Mary after it."—Exchange.

DIED BECAUSE THEY ADVOCATED A LICENSE LAW. —Zion's Herald exultingly states that Gov. Andrew and Linus Child, the lawyers that pleaded for license before the Legislature in the great liquor debate of 1867, are both dead, while those who advocated a prohibitory law, Dr. Miner and William B. Spooner, are still alive.

Ministers have been known to drop down dead in their pulpit on the "Lord's Day" while preaching and praying, and the inference is about as clear that the Lord killed them for being engaged in that kind of business, as it is that Gov. Andrew and Mr. Child died in consequence of advocating a license law.—Boston Investigator.

General Foster, the United States officer, translates the I. R. A. on the Fenian buttons to mean "I Run Away."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"There have been kind inquiries made for you and your family here by different friends; but it seemed to me there was a studied avoidance of any allusion to your work. It may be my imagination, but it seemed a little as if they were afraid of giving me pain, if they asked what you were doing; as if you had committed some misdeed. I dare say they have seen things in their religious papers, and feel that you are what some of them would call an apostate. I have not seen — or —, to have any conversation with them, or I should have talked of you to them, and given —, at least, THE INDEX to read. I have always supposed him to be a man who despised the shackles of Puritanism so much that he had neglected what would have been to him the interesting study of religion. If I had opportunity, I should show him THE INDEX; but I would not thrust it upon him without some conversation about it and you. — here is a good, stolid man, who takes his religious belief on trust, as it was transmitted to him from his fathers,—makes the best of the sunny side of it, as he does of the farm which came along with it, and gets 'a comfortable living' out of both. I am really very fond of him, for he has been very kind to me. I would not try to disturb his religious ideas, if I could; for I think it would not increase his happiness, any more than it would to sell his paternal acres and go 'out West', where he might be better off, but would not 'get used to it,' so as to feel comfortable, before it would be time for him to die."

"This morning a friend of mine handed me a copy of THE INDEX. I have perused it with much satisfaction. I like the sentiment; it has the ring of true metal. I am living where the Methodist doctrine is the prevailing doctrine. Of course, they make strenuous efforts to keep out all books and papers of a liberal character. They would, were it possible, chain the minds of the rising generation to the old orthodox creeds; but light is dawning, and many are ready to say, that 'whereas I was blind, now I see.' I think I can get up a handsome club for your INDEX here in —. If I succeed, you will hear from me again soon. Enclosed, I send two dollars for your paper one year; and you can count me as one who has faith in Free Religion and the progress of the age."

"I told you once that I liked THE INDEX. I told you because it was true and I wanted you to know it. I didn't say I liked you. I didn't know you, though I may have formed some opinion of you; an opinion, for instance, that you were not so silly as to suppose the compliment meant for you that strictly belonged to the paper and the principle it defends. I tell you again, I like the paper and mean to take it so long as it is—what it is. I've wanted it all my life. So have thousands of others who haven't heard of it yet. I'm going to let some of them hear of it soon. But I won't take any more of your time."

"Though baffled oft, I can always find a source of strength in the principles of Free Religion; and I feel now that I can return to the work with a more calm and unconscious courage, and less of an iconoclast. If my health were strong and I were made of rugged stuff, I could smile at the feeble persecutions of opinion; but people are so ignorant and earnest! The first man that told me he did not believe the Bible, I looked upon with dismay as a veritable son of perdition; and I know how people here regard me."

"I am somewhat puzzled to understand all the causes why men of Free Religious sentiments are so very anxious to see the movement going on, and yet do so little to help. I acknowledge my own tardiness; my reasons are many. I have been sold so many times on the religious auction block, that I am considerably 'skittish.' I want to see that I am right. So far, I am satisfied with THE INDEX and the 'Free Religious Association,' and wish that I could do more for the cause."

"Your endeavors to awaken Spiritualists out of their dreamy life, to bring them back to active individual life, and to show them that to grow is the object, and not to be slumbering under the lullaby of Spirit Songs—will also succeed, I hope. I should wish, though, that you should touch oftener that chord, and show them plainly the danger of giving up their brain to unknown spirits, be they in or out of the body."

TO THE STAR LYRA.

When every star of night is beaming
In the calm, deep blue sky,
Thou, Lyra, art the fairest-seeming
Unto my roving eye;
While orbs more brilliant far are burning,
To thee my pensive gaze is turning,—
And would'st thou ask me why?

Thou might'st have shone, mine eye unheeding,
Unsought thy ray might be,
But that its light, so pure, is pleading
A loved one's memory:
He who his thoughts to Heaven raiseth,
And on the stars oft nightly gazeth,
Revealed thy name to me.

The Index.

OCTOBER 8, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

"THE EXAMINER."

Just before going to press last week, we received the first number of this new monthly, the prospectus of which we noticed editorially a few weeks ago. It is a very handsome periodical, containing eight more than the announced ninety-six pages, and promising to add hereafter even to this number. The paper is good, and so is the typography, very few errors occurring to mar the fair appearance of the pages.

The contents embrace—

1. The first three chapters of a serial novel by the editor, entitled "Crazy Chicago." The opening sentence gives its purpose:—"I will frankly say that my object in writing this serial is to strike a succession of the hardest blows I can at follies, vices, and crimes which I find around me in the society, religion, and types of character which are current among us." Judged purely as a novel, we should say that there is too much descriptive and reflective writing, and too little conversation in it; but the story is avowedly subordinate to the thought, and such a criticism would be in this case unjust. Further comments we postpone until we can form a better conception of the purpose and drift of the series.

2. An article by the editor on "Charles Dickens and his Christian Critics," in which the deliverances of Messrs. Fulton, Beecher, Murray and Bellows on this subject are discriminatingly and very vigorously handled.

Mr. Towne is very severe on Messrs. Fulton and Beecher,—on the former for "the fierce, 'reeking' godliness of unadulterated heathenism," and the latter for being a "time-server." It is a very readable article, and, like everything that Mr. Towne writes, is white-hot with the enthusiasm of religious radicalism.

3. Another article by the editor, entitled "The Woman and the Trial," suggested by the McFarland-Richardson case. This reminds us of the days of ideal chivalry, when the sinewy knight would lay lance in rest to rescue the distressed lady from outrage worse than death, and rain terrible, resistless blows upon the miscreant that dared to pounce wolf-like upon his prey. It is, in our judgment, the best thing in the number, full of deep and tender reverence for woman, and full of a burning indignation against the "brutalism" that hides itself under the cloak of marriage. Especially fine is the severe rebuke he administers to Mrs. Stowe for the pharisaic morality of her "Oldtown Folks." No man or woman who sets the substance of marriage above its mere ceremonial form, can withhold sympathy from this clear and crushing exposure of a moral teaching which is the very demoralization of humanity.

4. A critique of Dr. J. F. Clarke's "Steps of Belief." This, to our mind, is not a satisfactory article. But our dissatisfaction comes from a different interpretation of Christianity from that which Mr. Towne sets himself so vigorously to defend.

5. The "Unitarian Situation,"—a scarifying exposure of follies and inconsistencies in the present leaders of Unitarianism. Poor Mr. Hepworth is chopped into mince-meat; and Messrs. Mayo and Bellows fare but little better. In the main we cannot pronounce the criticism, caustic and almost savage as it is, unjust; but we cannot help regretting, notwithstanding, that the sarcasm in which he indulges himself, and of which he is a master, should approach so near the verge of personal invective. We hope, however, that the bitter quinine he administers in such allopathic doses may operate beneficially on the Unitarian constitution. There can be no question about the fact of the disease thus "heroically" treated.

6. A "History of the Devil," translated from the Revue des Deux Mondes.

7. A variety of short, miscellaneous articles and paragraphs. An elaborate criticism of our position with respect to Christianity is promised for the next number of the Examiner, to which we would call the especial attention of readers of THE INDEX. Whoever believes that Christianity can be identified with pure Theism will doubtless find in it a very able and thorough defence of that opinion. There is every prospect of a full and fair discussion by Mr. Towne of this vital question of the times; and we shall undoubtedly feel called upon hereafter to consider the arguments he will offer.

We close this already long notice with the following short article, headed "Our Religious Purpose:—

"The editor of the Examiner begs his critics to state distinctly the full extent of his religious purpose, which is,—

1. To teach a CHRISTIANITY of which the creed is contained in the words, 'OUR FATHER WHO ART IN HEAVEN,' and is unfolded in the doctrines of God's PERFECT FATHERHOOD over all souls, the real BROTHERHOOD of ALL MEN on earth and in the world to come, our supreme duty of LOVE to MEN and filial LOYALTY, of trust and love, to GOD, and INSPIRATION AND PROVIDENCE the source and guarantee, author and authority, to every one of us, of knowledge, holiness, and blessedness forever.

2. To explain and prove, with sound learning and sound reasoning, the fact of error mingled with truth, from the very first, in historical Christianity, and how surely, in the exercise of Christian faith and reason, to distinguish between Christian truth and Christian error.

3. To root up the theological heathenism,—total depravity, divine wrath, damnation, and blood atonement, which choke Christian truth in orthodox teaching.

4. To expel from true Christian religion every form of Jesuism, or regard for Jesus as more than a mere man, and all Bibliolatry, or regard for the Bible as more than a collection of mere human writings.

And this to the end of plainly opening to all human feet the path of direct, obedient, and happy trust in God; and in the sincere belief that the Judaic and half-heathen Christianity of the existing sects is doomed of God to speedy extinction."

"THE RADICAL."

The subjoined letter to the editor of the Boston Commonwealth will show that The Radical is not dead, as some papers maliciously represent (the wish being father to the thought), but will in all probability take a fresh start at New Year. We are not of those who look with alarm at the "multiplication of radical magazines and journals," believing that it as surely increases thought as the opening of new railroads increases travel, and that it would be inexcusable selfishness, if we should wish ill to any such enterprise through fear of its effect upon our own interests. The Radical, the Examiner, and THE INDEX, instead of clashing, will retain each its own individual character, do each a work that neither of the others could do, and go each peacefully to its own grave when this work is done. If there is indeed to be a "struggle for life," none but the "improved species" will come out of it alive; and shall radicals, of all persons in the world, quarrel with this most wholesome law of Nature? To all such possibilities, we are utterly and absolutely indifferent; and we, confess, we find it difficult to repress our impatience at the narrow and timorous apprehensions to which Mr. Morse refers. If the Radical kills THE INDEX, why, let it. If the Examiner kills us both, why, let it. The death of all three of us would not seriously derange the solar system. Can any sane man doubt that the spirit of the age would soon create some better organ still? He is a very credulous person who believes that Orthodoxy would gain by running the plough-share through all our little potato-patches; for out of the ploughed ground would start forth a crop of which Orthodoxy has not had, and never will have, the sowing. Free ideas only can grow in America; and the demand for them is so great that, instead of fearing for the prosperity of the Radical or the Examiner, we only wish that there were two hundred in place of only two such planters in the country. The Radical has done a grand, a magnificent work; and if Mr. Morse only keeps it up with the same splendid faith with which he began it, there need be no such word as "fail" in his vocabulary. But here is the letter:—

MR. EDITOR:—Allow me through the Commonwealth to reach those of your readers who are interested in the Radical. I wish to say that I hope to renew that publication next January. I am now working to secure for it what it has never yet had—capital to work with. Instead of being in any sense a failure, it is doubtful in my mind if any other magazine, even of the more popular kind, ever won so substantial a success from so small a pecuniary investment. I suspended the publication of the Radical last July, feeling that five years of effort to establish it against so great odds was all I could afford. I wished opportunity for an appeal to the friends it had in that time secured. I was confident that it had gained so good a hold on Radical minds, six months of silence could not prove an injury. I am glad to say, so far as my plan has been understood, it has been approved. Some uneasiness has been expressed lest the multiplication of new "radical" magazines and journals, starting up in the interval of the Radical's apparent discomfiture, should make the task of resuming somewhat difficult. But I am happy to say that I retain all my former list of contributors. Thus armed I do not see any lions in the path I need to fear.

The prospect of obtaining the financial support that I require is encouraging. But I need from this time the active co-operation of all who are friendly.

I propose, with more means at my command, to make the Radical still more efficient in its statements of rational thought than it has heretofore been; my aim, however, will continue to be to avoid all partisan or sectarian controversy. Endeavoring to do justice to all phases of thought, the writers will frankly state their own views, hoping to unite by the free, intelligent persuasion of all, rather than divide the people of this country into hostile camps. We want no religious war; our interests and our aspirations are all peaceful. The heroisms of peace are nobler than any the battle-field can offer. But the horrors of a religious strife are often predicted. If we would prove the prophecy unfounded, how else shall it be done than by persistent endeavors to liberate all classes through education in the paths of religious toleration and rational thinking?

BURY THE DEAD.

NEW YORK, Sept. 27, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR:—I have just read Mr. Porter's article on "Free Churches," and feel like saying that I, for one, think it one of the beauties of Free Religion that, when one of its churches can no longer be kept healthy and vigorous, it is better to let it die. It was a mistake to try to keep alive Parker's Church in Boston. Our country is already too full of churches that are paralytic, deformed, lame, and blind. When the time comes for a church to die, let it die; and from its dust in due time will arise a new, fresh and vigorous church to fill its place. Religious ideas can no more remain stationary than political ideas. Religious progress is as necessary as social; but how are we to have true progress, if we try to preserve and use those opinions that are out of date? Let them be shelved as relics of the past, interesting to students, but no longer the furniture of the chambers of the mind.

With sincere respect,

M. L. H.

DOMESTIC SERVICE.

ROCK FALLS, ILL., Sept. 24, 1870.

MY DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—I send herewith an unscholarly article, written on the same subject as that on which Col. Higginson wrote in the Woman's Journal, copied in THE INDEX of last week. The Colonel, it seems to me, has not helped the condition of this numerous class very much. I have often felt much grieved at the treatment these girls receive from "professing Christians" and reformers are not bettering the matter very much.

Col. Higginson's sympathies for those poor girls who starve are diminished, when he thinks of the numerous households constantly imploring, "Come and work for me ten hours a day at $3 per week and your board." Let Col. Higginson and others banish forever from their minds the idea of superiority over these girls, except that of a higher grade of intellect and superior culture. Let them treat the girls, when they come, in such a way as to convince them that it is in no wise degrading for them to work, and they will flock to their households, not as menials cowering before superiors, "begging leave to toil," but as friends and equals; and a great benefit will result to each.

How careful the Colonel is to use the terms that express a lower or degraded condition, such as "servant," "domestic," "mistress," etc! There are some quite respectable men, possessing considerable property, too, whose daughters do the household work. Are they "servants," "domestics"? Is their mother a "mistress"?

W. E. LAKENS.

[Our friend, whose excellent article on "Servant Girls" we republish elsewhere from the Morrison (Ill.) Investigator, not as a corrective but as a companion-piece to Col. Higginson's "Surrendering Too Soon," has quite failed to do justice to the spirit of the latter. There is not a man in America who has a greater respect than he for the dignity of honest work, nor one who more emphatically rejects the idea of superiority not based on character or ability. In this very article, he rejoices in the practical equality accorded to "a certain intelligent American hand-maiden" in a Boston family well-known to all friends of radical reform. He says distinctly that he would "rather see a kinswoman of his own support herself by paid housework" than by the needle or sewing-machine. Could anything be stronger or plainer than this?

We know there is far too much arrogance, superciliousness, and unkindness to domestics in American households; and it is really to the honor of poor girls that they object to enduring such treatment. But it is not to their honor that they prefer in so many cases a life of prostitution. The pride which prefers voluntary vice to the endurance of any injustice, however harsh, is deplorable, and rightly cuts off much of the sympathy that would otherwise be freely yielded. Col. Higginson is right. A true self-respect would teach American girls that virtue even in servitude is more honorable than vice in freedom.—ED.]

VIRTUE ITS OWN REWARD.

ADEL, IOWA, Sept. 22, 1870.

DEAR INDEX:—A few Sundays ago I accidentally stepped into our Methodist Church during class meeting; and as it was the first time in my life I ever witnessed such confessions, I am induced to send you the impressions prompted by the occasion.

They were all sincere and earnest in their professions that they were endeavoring, for the Redeemer's sake, to fulfil the commands of God, and to enjoy an endless happiness hereafter as the final reward. Are such motives conducive to the highest development of character? If I understood their position, a virtuous act is done through a sense of allegiance to God, and for his love and approbation. Bring this position to a strict investigation, and can there be anything more absurd than that the sincere promptings of our nature must first be preceded by a secondary motive, before they can be acknowledged as the rightful law of our action? The love of our neighbor, with all its attendant virtues of justice, mercy, kindness, must first be converted into the cold motive of obedience to a divine sovereign, before it can be classed as of the highest attainment. How much more noble the idea that "virtue is its own reward!" How much higher the position that "religion is the effort of man to perfect himself" rather than to please a sovereign! And how much more conducive to public virtue! To love and practise morals as the divine order of our being, rather than as simple goodness, is alien to our natures, and must be introduced by a foreign force. Self-respect must go before true honor; and the highest manhood cannot be attained, when we are taught that to degrade ourselves is to honor divinity.

THE WAR FROM A GERMAN STAND-POINT.

TOLEDO, Sept. 24, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.

Dear Sir,—I need not tell you how highly I value your excellent thoughts; your paper is a source of pleasure not only, but more yet of instruction to me. But this time I could not swallow the meal it brought; my whole heart revolted at the food you had prepared in the second part of your lecture on "War and Free Religion." Is this, I asked myself, the clear-headed writer that spoke the great truths which fill the first part of the speech? If it is, truly his good heart must have run away this time with his head,—and no wonder,—at the sight of the bloody battle-fields. So, and only so, could I understand your sentiments. Far be it from me to ascribe any unclean motives to your thoughts, though I can not, up to this moment, explain how a man that stands so high above the common niveau, should in such a life-question yield to the weakness of his people. It is exactly the same sound that rings from the horn of England,—that England which plays the old, infamous tricks towards Germany now that it played in our war towards the Northern States. We know what the peace-cry of the English "pedler souls" means. In our war it was money that darkened their eyesight to entire blindness; here it is jealousy, envy, that lays the weight in the scale of the peace-balance. But the one motive is as good as the other—blind is blind. In the midst of their victorious march, the German armies shall stop, and the enemy that is thrown to the ground, but has not surrendered, is not tied yet, shall be set free! O those hypocrites, that want to rob the conquerors of the fruit of their victories? Fear and jealousy of German greatness is the stone that lies so heavy in the stomach of the neutral peace-makers, but not the wish to prevent blood-shed; else they would have done more to prevent the outbreak of the war than they did do.

Why did you not wish the Northern states of America to suspend their bloody war against their brethren, before it was completed? Why not say then,—"Stop, and don't drive a high-spirited people to desperation?" You wanted the guarantees of a lasting peace; and the only way to obtain them was war to the bitter end. Is it not so? Exactly this is the case in the present European war. You might just as well say to the constable who has captured a murderer,—"O pray, let him go! Be not so hard on him! His high spirit cannot stand a humiliation so deep; and moreover he is destined to take the lead of all true lovers of liberty!" No, let him feel the heels on his neck, until he stretches the tongue and submits willingly to justice or grace, whatever his judge may pronounce upon him.

"Germany is at war with Napoleon," you say, "not with the French people." Let me tell you that every single Frenchman is just as great a rogue as his Emperor, even the now would-be republicans not excepted; and they can only claim the world's sympathy after they have received the punishment they deserve. Or has there been a voice of protest from the side of this "Grand Nation" against the war provoked by their leader? Like a herd of sheep, they ran with their buck blindly into the abyss; and they are sorry now, not for the crime they intended to do, but only for not being able to carry their plan out. Do you indeed believe that the sacrifices of German blood are not worth a higher price than could be obtained by a peace made now?

With every German soldier who had to bite the grass, a valuable intelligence has sunk into the grave, which can not be counterbalanced by hundreds of barbarous Turcos or servile slaves of the French despot. You say that a continuance of the war has ceased to be necessary, since the day of Sedan. You know what France is. It is the modern Babel called Paris which gave peace war to the world, just as it pleased. There France must be conquered. Cut off the limbs of a poisonous reptile, and they will grow over night again. Germany must not shun to strike at the very heart of this crocodile, even at the risk of losing the sympathy of all her false friends. If Paris would rather be made even with the ground than give up a hopeless defence, they are to blame, not the Germans.

But the bitterest pill is to come yet. May he swallow it who pleases.—I can't. You call the war, since the capture of the Emperor, a war against the Republic. The Republic of today is not that of tomorrow, and the present government of France has no more right to claim this name, than a dozen crazy Fenians have to call themselves the Republic of Ireland, or a crowd of Irish Copperheads in New York have to call themselves the Republic of America. Where, then, is the guarantee of treaties made with them? The world knows what a French Republic means, as she has had occasion to taste its fruits already. What was the action of this so-called Republic, to whom you seem to devote your hearty sympathy? She completed the tyrannical order of the Empire,—the expulsion from France of all that had a German name. What is the material of this Republic? Is it not the very same crowd of slaves that for eighteen years has willingly borne the yoke of a despot on their necks, and only four months ago, with a majority of seven millions of votes, sealed and sanctified their fate? A wonderfully fast progress indeed, if a heap of ignorant slaves could be made over night the representatives of the highest liberty. Even if we had not the experience we have, we could know that a people which was ruled with the bayonet so long would not yield to moral laws, as the citizens of a Republic must, in order to be happy.

Whether the European world be ripe for a Republic, or whether they wish this form of government at present, are questions I do not wish to discuss here; but so much is certain, that it is not anxious for the blessings of a French model republic. The world knows the French blessing; and is sick of it.

I believe you entirely wrong, in stating that "Germany is now at war with the French Republic." Let France be conquered, and neither Bismarck nor Wilhelm will interfere with the form of government which the French people will choose by vote. But as things are standing now in France, there is no government to be recognized as such by the German powers, but that which was sanctioned in the plebiscite, and this is indeed Napoleon. Germany is neither fighting for monarchical nor republican principles; she is simply carrying out the defence of her home and her rights against the desires of a robber-nation.

You say, "Let the people of the German-speaking provinces decide for themselves whether they shall belong to France or Germany." Have we not liberated the slaves, without asking them whether they wish to be set free or not? When France stole those countries from Germany, did it ask the people about their will? Or do you indeed call this unjust, when Germany takes repossession of a stolen property?

The sympathy of the world is worth a great deal in such a struggle, and the ears of the Germans are not deaf to the counsel of others; but I hope they will not regard the counsel of the fox who had lost his tail in the trap, and then told his fox brothers to cut off their tails too, as an unnecessary addition to their bodies.

Who is responsible for all the blood which the soil of Europe has drunk for the last hundred years? The bed of Lake Erie could be filled with the blood of the slaughtered in war, provoked by the "Grand Nation." But the history of the world is the judgment of the world. And in vain will it be withheld from the German race the credit of being the first power, not only physically, but also intellectually. Germany's mastery is the peace of Europe.

I am very respectfully yours,

C. WEBER.

A DIFFERENT GERMAN VIEW OF THE WAR.

TITUSVILLE, PA., Sept. 25, 1870.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—It was with the greatest pleasure that I read your excellent article—"War and Free Religion"—in the last INDEX. To show how much we are agreed on that point, but especially on the French-Prussian war, I only need to inform you of the first sentence of a speech of mine, recently delivered at the celebration by the Germans here of the extraordinary German victories. This sentence was,—"All hail Republican France!"

I wish, with you, that a satisfactory peace, honorable for both sides and not too hard for France, could be established, and that the young Republic may gain strength and stability. But, my dear friend, I am not very sanguine to see our wish realized. Not, indeed, because I fear Germany might be too exacting; but I have my misgivings as to the French themselves. If the N. Y. Herald of yesterday is correctly informed, Bismarck, perhaps William, will not be too hard; but the French are—French. M. Favre, I confidently believe, could and would come to an understanding with Bismarck, if he should be allowed to do so, and if he should be the government long enough. There are, however, ominous indications of the contrary. I much apprehend it does not need King William to put down the Republic. The French will do him that service. I should not be much surprised to see a good Republic in Germany before France shall have one. It seems the French people is too versatile for a Republic.

Fraternal yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

P. S.—I almost forgot a request I wanted to make. Please put me down for a bound volume of THE INDEX. I generally give my copy of THE INDEX away. But there will be interesting matter enough in a bound volume of it to make THE INDEX worth ten times its cost, and a very instructive and desirable book.

M. E.

[We print the two preceding communications, both written by gentlemen we highly respect, with equal willingness. It is our custom to give our views frankly, and to welcome criticism. We will only add that the writer of the letter quoted in the "Note" to our "War and Free Religion" was Dr. C. H. Horsch, of Dover, N. H., whose name is not unknown to our readers, and to whom THE INDEX is indebted for over fifty subscribers.—Ed.]

MOTIVES AND SELF-CONTROL.

OLATHE, KANSAS, Sept. 15, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—I have not time to write an essay for THE INDEX on "Free Agency" or "Self-determination," even if you were willing to devote so much space to such a metaphysical subject; but I have a great desire to send you the result of our investigations after several years' anxious and careful study of this question. Twenty years ago it seemed to me one of the most important, being at the "bottom" (as Locke would have it) of all moral questions. As you are no doubt familiar with all the phases of the question, from John Locke down to thinkers of the present day, I will merely state that none of the views presented satisfied me so nearly as the one that "man is always governed by motives,"—by that motive which is strongest at the time of action. Yet this view does not indicate the whole fact. It is not true that man is governed or impelled to action by impulsive emotion, or motive, always in the same sense as every animal is actuated by impulsive instinct. The grand distinction—human from animal—is that the one has the power of self-control, the other has not. Yet this self-control does not amount to "free agency," or rather self-determination; it merely arrests action until the different motives, or moral sentiments and intellect, have had time to operate. The self-control or delay from action, you will acknowledge, must be dependent upon the individual development. If he have large caution, he will delay longer; but there must be a decision. He must either act or not; and when he does act, it will invariably be found that his action has been decided by those motives or sentiments which are strongest at the time of action. An opportunity of making money dishonestly may have been suggested; but this delaying the act has allowed conscientiousness to be called up, and the action is forbidden. Would you, therefore, call the man a free-agent, a self-determining agent, because he had power to act either way? We must not forget that freedom of action and freedom of determination are different things. An animal is free to act or not to act, but he is invariably determined by his instincts; he cannot control them like man. Suppose the individual has not conscientiousness nor caution developed to any extent; what will his action be? He will deliberate very little, if any, when such an opportunity is presented.

This self-control (and when man has not any, he is little more or better than an animal) simply enables man, when educated, to determine which of his sentiments shall govern his actions,—his higher or lower,—his human or animal.

This view harmonizes with other great facts which no one will deny. It shows the necessity of developing or educating the moral sentiments as much as the intellect. There would be no use of self-control, unless there were higher sentiments to call up. It shows that what we call sin is a necessary condition of a progressive, undeveloped creature, such as man; the lower sentiments will decide his actions, until the higher are developed by exercise or education. It teaches charity for shortcomings, which are the necessary results of an undeveloped state.

What else is moral work, then, but the harmonious development of all the sentiments? If right action depends upon the development and entirety of the higher sentiments as well as the intellect, shall we say that each individual can develop these sentiments when he pleases? Is it not wholly a matter out of the reach of his will-power, partly dependent on progenitors and partly on his own education?

In what sense, then, is man free? We see at once in his nature that great fact (so apparent in the vegetable and animal kingdoms), a principle at work for his gradual development, even though he is unconscious of it. This self-control arrests action; and if there is any higher force developed, an opportunity is given for it to come forward and decide action, form character, and build up the man from the animal.

Merit and demerit are changed into harmony and disharmony. It is just as impossible for the benevolent to act selfishly, as for the selfish to act benevolently, as each is developed without the other. And if the character of a Howard or a Melancthon is the result of certain fixed laws, it does not necessarily detract from their value. It may hurt our vanity a little, perhaps, but I believe it is a demonstrable fact that we are governed by instinctive sentiments or emotions, created for us, not by us; and even our intellectual convictions are outside of our volitions. We cannot say we will believe or we won't believe; but when the evidence is to us sufficient, belief necessarily follows. Yet who does not see that this fact, if such it is, binds together the whole race in one brotherhood, destined by these very principles, self-control and its necessary result, harmonious development, to final perfection?

It would not be difficult to show that the higher sentiments, conscientiousness, benevolence, etc., are naturally brought into exercise gradually by the intellect and self-control; but I have said enough for the present.

Very truly yours,

J. E. SUTTON.

MOTIVES.

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 24, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR:—If the murderer who applied the match to the gunpowder were found to be insane, mankind are already so far advanced as to look on him with lenity, and their action in the matter would be to put him and his matches in a safe place. Did he act from impulse or compulsion? Does any one pretend to know how much latent insanity there is among men, or to what extent morality or wickedness, in the individual, is the result of harmony or discord in that delicate organ—the brain? Some of the recent verdicts in murder trials show a disposition to give to these disturbing causes more latitude than many of us deem safe. Believing that the stronger motives push the weaker ones to the wall, and flourish more or less according as they are favored, we do not think it well to make the conditions so favorable to the development of the baser sort. If a man be moved to do certain things and refrains, is it not because a motive weightier than the first directs his choice?

I don't suppose you want to give this subject any more room, nor do I care to have you. I cannot help saying to you, however, that your comments seem to me rather to ignore the only point I tried to make.

It may be folly, as you say, not to accept one doctrine and reject the other; but I can no more deny the fact of my consciousness than I can accept your hypothesis. Are there not subjects on which, "frame what suppositions we may, we find, on tracing out their implications, that they leave us nothing but a choice between opposite absurdities?"

Very respectfully,

E. R. L.

MR. F. E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.

[We are very sorry if we seemed to evade the main point of our correspondent's thoughtful communication. We tried to answer plainly one of its many points. If he will state tersely the point he means, we will do our best to answer it without any evasion—a trick which we abominate. What is exactly intended to be understood by the "weightiest" motive?

We ought to apologize for the apparently discourteous implication of our remark—"Some persons (not very wisely) endeavor to accept both." We were under the misapprehension that E. R. L. accepted only one of the two doctrines referred to. He has at least the high sanction of Sir William Hamilton for the conclusion (to us very repugnant) expressed in his closing quotation.—Ed.]

THE ORGANIZATION REQUIRED.

EDITOR INDEX:—I am pleased to see the subject of organization up for discussion in THE INDEX. It is a subject that should engage the consideration of every friend of human progress. Church organization does not seem to be adapted to radical reform. Churches were organized for the purpose of saving men from the woes of a future life, and their machinery is adapted to that purpose alone. In later years many attempts have been made to interest the church in matters pertaining to the welfare of humanity in this world, but such attempts have failed in every instance. Exceptional churches may be found that have performed some labor in this direction; but no reform has yet succeeded in the Church.

Then, again, church organization is not adapted to democratic institutions. In every church one man only is ordained to teach, and all the rest of the church are expected to accept the views that the ordained oracle shall present. This one man does the talking and the rest of the church do the hearing. Then, with the church, its preservation and extension over the earth are the paramount object in view, and all other questions must be subservient to this.

Now this old institution is not adapted to the radical work of to-day, and all attempts to organize radicals into churches must fail. The church is not broad enough or high enough to accommodate the free religious spirit of this age. Radicals must organize, but not as churches. Their work is in and for the present world, and the machinery to be used must be constructed with that object in view.

Science has never been able to enlist the church in its behalf, but on the contrary has had to fight her way through the church. The anti-slavery and temperance reforms have been driven to organizing outside of the church, and every other reform in the past has had the same experience.

Now there are up for consideration questions of vital interest to humanity. The evils of intemperance loom up before us all over the land, the question of the rights and proper sphere of women is to be settled during the next ten years; also the question of the relation of capital and labor. And besides these and other questions, the great question of political and religious liberty is again raised by the church, and an attempt is being made to give us a State religion that should be incorporated into the Constitution and be taught in our public schools.

On some of these questions the church is an interested party, and to others it will not give a hearing. Now in order that these questions should be properly settled, they must be discussed by the people, and every man or woman who has a thought concerning them should be permitted to present it. And it is evident to all that the church dare not open its doors to such a free discussion.

What kind of an organization do the times require? I believe Radical Clubs, or perfectly free societies under other names, are demanded. These societies should spring up in every town in the land. They should be independent and free. First of all they should have no connection with any church, however liberal the church may be. There should be no exclusion on account of belief, no hindrance to honest expression of opinion. There should be but one motto—truth; and but one object—the elevation of humanity.

These clubs should hold weekly meetings in which to discuss the questions of the day; each member feeling himself or herself the peer of every other member.

The time has arrived to encourage in place of suppressing free thought and free speech. And in these club meetings members not used to public speaking might occupy their portion of the time in reading selections appropriate to the question under discussion.

As I have stated in your columns before, large numbers are not necessary for the formation of a club. What is required is three or four honest men and women who are prepared to dedicate themselves to the work of humanity and fearlessly to follow wherever truth shall lead them. Numbers of such persons, I believe, can be found in nearly every town in this country. Is it not time, friends, that we thus organized and commenced work in earnest?

A SEARCHING INVESTIGATION.

[From the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist.]

It is stated that Mehemet Ali, making a tour of his provinces once, in great state and with a cavalry guard, was stopped by an old woman, who threw herself at his feet. "Your Highness," said she, "one of your soldiers has bought some milk of me for six paras, and won't pay me." "Why won't you pay her?" demanded Mehemet Ali. "Master," said he, "this woman lies; she has sold me no milk, and I owe her nothing." "You swear by Allah that you speak the truth?" said the Pasha then to the woman. "Yes, I swear it." "And you as well?" said he to the soldier. "Yes, I swear it." "Very well," said the Pasha. Then turning to his guard, he added, with perfect composure, "Take this man and open his stomach." The Pasha's order was obeyed, and the milk was found. The soldier had just drunk it. "The woman is right," said Mehemet Ali, remounting his horse; "let her have the six paras that are due her." And he continued his journey.

If that Pacha of many Tails, the Sovereign People of the United States, could get all their public servants disembowelled, the contents of their capacious stomachs would be a sight for sore eyes. We should then see, to our entire satisfaction, what becomes of the taxes. If the agents of the United States could only be ripped open, revenue enough would flow out of their bowels to carry on a dozen governments.

ANOTHER FALL OF FREE RELIGION.—The Radical, the organ of the new school of sceptics, ceases to exist with the present number. It has been a very able journal of very erroneous thought. Its editor said, not many months ago, "the Church was played out." It seems that it was the other party. It has been extreme in its theories, calling Christ a stumbling-block and demanding His removal from the thoughts of the times. That stumbling-block it has stumbled over unto its death. Rev. Mr. Alger's society was lately reconstructed to save it from dissolution. Rev. Mr. Connor's society has gone to pieces. Theodore Parker's society draws its parting breath.

Will not Messrs. Abbot, Frothingham, and their friends hear the voice speaking unto them as did a man of old, who thought he could kill Christianity, and saying unto them, "I am Jesus whom ye persecute. It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." May they all repent as did Paul, and forsake an error which is as unpopular and unprofitable as it is untrue.—Zion's Herald.

Tally one for Jim Fisk. McFarland applied to him for a railroad pass. Jim told him they were not issuing free passes to assassins that day; but when ever he got control of a road making through-connections for hell, McFarland should go through on the lightning express, free.—N. Y. Independent.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

REPORT FOR 1870.

The pamphlet REPORT of the Annual Meeting of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870 can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, D. A. WASSON, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, F. E. ABBOT, SAMUEL JOHNSON, RABBI I. M. WISE, T. W. HIGGINSON and Wm. H. CHANNING. Price 50 cents. Also CHANNING'S Address on the "RELIGIONS OF CHINA" in a separate pamphlet. Price 20 cents.

CONVENTIONS

The Committee appointed to arrange for Conventions under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, have decided to appoint Conventions this autumn in the West at Cincinnati, Toledo, and (probably) Indianapolis. It is thought now that these Conventions will be held the last week of October and first week of November, beginning at Cincinnati, Tuesday evening, Oct. 25. They will be attended by the President and Secretary, and other officers and members of the Association. Further particulars as to time and speakers next week.

We have great satisfaction in publishing the subjoined article from Mr. T. W. Higginson on the subject to which we have sought to draw attention in the last two numbers of THE INDEX. Mr. Higginson, when he wrote, had only read the first of our articles. We wish to add here, that nothing was farther from our thought than to speak of the dissolution of radical free churches, and the frequent withdrawal of radical ministers from the pulpit, in any tone of "discouragement." Our purpose was simply to point out another interpretation of these facts than that which is generally given. We would accept the facts, not as proving that radicalism cannot support religious institutions of any kind, but as indicating the necessity of radical ideas organizing a new form of "church," and a new order of "ministry." And the points that Mr. Higginson makes confirm our opinion. The Worcester Free Church prospered while he remained with it (and we are glad to be reminded that it lasted as long as six years), but dissolved on his leaving it. We have no doubt that it would have continued in a flourishing condition to this day under his leadership. There is no question that a man of first-rate abilities and character can gather a weekly assembly to hear the presentation of radical religious views. But a society organized only for this purpose and about a special preacher, if it be radical, naturally falls to pieces on dissolving the relation with him. If, as Mr. Higginson says, the old churches of conservative faith are also coming more and more to depend upon the ability of the preacher for their prosperity, and less upon ecclesiastic forms, it is because the ideas which formed the forms are being gradually undermined and revolutionized even there. And we believe that the radical and rationalistic culture which is doing this revolutionizing work, will by and by produce a new kind of religious organization,—an organization in which success shall not depend upon one man, but upon the interest and activity of all the members; but which at the same time shall create a demand for a class of thoroughly educated public teachers on the highest themes of truth and duty,—call them preachers, lecturers, ministers, or what you will, provided the name do not savor of the priest or ecclesiastic.

RADICAL FREE CHURCHES.

This subject has lately attracted much attention, culminating in an elaborate article in the last INDEX by W. J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association. For one I agree with most of the statements in the article, and think them well put; yet must demur at what seems a slight tone of over-discouragement.

Some facts also seem inadequately stated. For instance, the diminution of Theodore Parker's Society, since his death, is unquestionable. But almost any Society would have suffered a great shock from the loss of so very eminent a minister; and had Robert Collyer accepted the call that was offered him to be Theodore Parker's successor, we might all have been saying, "See what a permanent institution!" Or had they taken Mr. Alger, Music Hall would still have been filled under the same name, instead of under a different one. No religious organization, not even a Roman Catholic Church, can be insured against the danger of an injudicious choice of a successor in its pulpit.

The real difficulty lies in the scarcity of men with a natural gift for pulpit oration, and personal influence. It was for the want of such a man, and for that reason only, that Samuel Johnson's society at Lynn was dissolved after he left it. This, and this only, brought the Worcester Free Church to an end. My friend Potter calls that Society a brief experiment. I do not know what he calls brief; the writer was with it six years, and might have remained sixteen, but his longing for literature as an exclusive pursuit took him away. Some recent newspaper has invented the rumor that this particular individual was "starved out;" he is seldom inclined to notice personal misstatements, but for the sake of young men undertaking Free Churches it may be well to deny this absolutely. He received the same salary up to the end that had been promised at the beginning; it was quite enough; and when he gave up preaching, it involved for the time a pecuniary sacrifice.

The whole matter of the pecuniary support of Free Churches lies in a nutshell. If there is any difficulty, it does not lie mainly in the doctrines taught, but in the mode of organization. A church which abolishes its pews will always find it a little harder to raise money thenceforward, though Calvin or Turretin supply the doxy. A pew is an investment, and a man pays his tax and takes his seat on Sunday, in order to keep up the value of the stock. This, at least, is to be taken into the account. If there is any special trouble about raising money for Radical Churches, it is because they have usually free seats. James Freeman Clark's theology is conservative enough, but I remember when his church had the same financial anxieties, and the elder Boston clergymen always used to predict that it would fall to pieces, if he should happen to die; a test which I am happy to say has not yet been applied.

I believe any young man who has the requisite gifts in himself—that is, who unites health, energy, independence, good education, radical views, a ready tongue and a sympathetic heart—can go into any large and growing city in America, and obtain a hearing and a support. But he must devote himself entirely to that aim,—merging in it all collateral interests, all literary tastes, and all plans of study and travel. All this, it may be said, is demanding a great deal; but nothing else will suffice. The reason most men fail in preaching is simply the reason for all other failures—they have over-rated their powers or mistaken their mission.

All religious bodies have to face the fact that the age demands more and more of its clergy, as the people become more intelligent. One of the most eminent conservative clergymen in New England said to me the other day that he and all his brethren were still obviously living on the prestige and traditions bequeathed by other days. These artificial supports were almost worn out, he said, and the time was fast approaching when it would be impossible for a man of second-rate abilities to sustain himself in the ministry. And as first-rate men were rare, and as most of them preferred other avocations, he frankly admitted it to be doubtful whether, a century hence, there would be any separate body of clergymen at all. NOTICE.—The REPORTS, in pamphlet form, of the Annual Meetings of the Free Religious Association for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cts. respectively), REV. SAMUEL JOHNSON'S Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cts.), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cts.), all published through the Association, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Wm. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

The Report for 1868 contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN P. HUBBARD, OLYMPIA BROWN, JOHN WEISS, T. W. HIGGINSON, F. E. ABBOT, A. B. ALCOTT, and others, each presenting some distinct aspect of the religious tendencies of the times; also a long address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, specifically prepared for the Association, on "THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO PHILANTHROPY;" Essay by F. B. SANBORN, on the same subject; Essay by W. J. POTTER, on "PRESENT TENDENCIES OF SOCIETY IN REGARD TO RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION AND WORSHIP;" the specific Reports of the Executive Committee of the Association, and Letters from M. D. CONWAY in England, and KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, of India.

The Report for 1869 contains addresses by FROTHINGHAM, WEISS, ABBOT, HIGGINSON, PROF. DENTON, J. H. JONES, RALPH WALDO EMERSON, C. A. BARTOL, LUCY STONE, HORACE SEEVER, ROWLAND CONNOR, and others; Essays by JULIA WARD HOWE, DAVID A. WASSON, and RABBI ISAAC M. WISE; and Annual Report of the Executive Committee.

Some of these addresses are as conservative in their theology as others are pronounced in their radicalism,—the Association having offered a free platform to all phases of religious thought.

"I think," said Mr. Bronson Alcott, once in conversation, "that when a man lives on beef he becomes something like an ox; if he eats mutton he begins to look sheepish, and if he eats pork may he not grow to be swinish?" "That may be," said Dr. Walker, of Cambridge; "but when a man lives on nothing but vegetables, I think he is very apt to be pretty small potatoes!"—N. Y. Observer.

The New York Tribune inquires, "Where is the beef of the future to come from?" Unless something turns up that we cannot foresee, the probability is that the beef of the future, like the beef of the past, will come from cattle.

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, and PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HAVE DECLARED. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

TOLEDO, . . . OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE MINISTRY OF FREE RELIGION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, September 2, 1869.]

"In fact, the clergy are at present divisible into three sections: an immense body who are ignorant and speak out, a small proportion who know and are silent, and a minute minority who know and speak according to their knowledge."

PROF. HUXLEY, Scientific Education, in "Macmillan's Magazine" for June, 1869.

"He [Jesus] professed that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance; which implied his modest opinion that there were some in his time so good that they need not hear even him for improvement; but nowadays we have scarce a little parson, that does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministrations; and that whoever omits them offends God."

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, Letter to Rev. George Whitefield, dated 1753, in Parton's "Life of Franklin," p. 322.

Within the past week I have received from the Trustees of the "First Independent Society of Toledo," acting in your behalf, a formal invitation to become your minister for the ensuing year; and I have signified to them my acceptance of it. The two months for which I was at first engaged have just expired, and to-day, without any idle ceremonies of installation, I enter at once upon the duties of the year. It seems to me, therefore, the most fitting occasion for explaining to you, more in detail than has hitherto been possible, precisely what these duties are. So great a change of base as you have made by your recent vote, by which henceforth our Society plants itself on Free Religion instead of Christianity, could not but involve corresponding changes in its aims and methods; and I wish this morning to define, as clearly as I may, the relations which I shall sustain to you during the continuance of my ministry.

The position of a "minister of the gospel," in the olden time, was one of great influence and power. He was an officer, clothed with authority "to declare the whole counsel of God," in Scripture phrase; and, as such, he was regarded as entitled to great official respect. "I magnify mine office," said Paul; and every Christian minister has conceived it his duty to do the same ever since. Even among Protestants, a great deal of priestly assumption has clung to the ministerial office; and nothing but the increasing diffusion of intelligence and independence of spirit among the people could ever have thrown discredit on this ecclesiastical usurpation and pride. Being an authorized expounder of the gospel, the minister naturally assumed a dogmatic tone, and laid down the law in all spiritual matters, as if the Almighty had made him his confidant and colleague in the administration of the universe. Being also the recognized pastor of a parish, the minister took upon himself to be in all practical matters, also, the "shepherd of the sheep,"—to reprove individuals for their sins, to dictate to them their duty, and thus infringe upon the rights of the private conscience. In short, the relation between minister and people used to be to a greater or less extent that of authority on the one hand and submission on the other; nor, on Christian principles, could it be otherwise. The Catholic priest, with his almost absolute power over the minds and consciences of his charge, is the truest representative of the Christian ministry as based upon the Christian Confession. The Protestant clergyman is a cross between the Catholic priest and the Lyceum lecturer, with the weaknesses of both and the strength of neither.

Quite unlike the minister of the Christian gospel will be the minister of Free Religion. He must differ from the Catholic priest in claiming no authority whatever over the intellect or conscience of his people; and he must differ from the Lyceum lecturer in having a definite and earnest moral purpose. The position he must occupy will be neither that of a sacred official, divinely commissioned to proclaim terms of salvation to a perishing world; nor yet that of an intellectual confectioner, retailing candies and perhaps a few pills of solid instruction sugar-coated with jests and anecdotes. A great deal of genuine Free Religion has found utterance both in the Christian pulpit (Catholic as well as Protestant) and on the Lyceum lecture platform, which some very earnest men and women have used as a mere instrumentality in the work of reform; but it is nevertheless true on the average that the Christian pulpit aims first and foremost at the salvation of souls, and that the Lyceum platform aims first and foremost at intellectual recreation. Something higher than either of these aims,—a purpose more rational and liberal than that of the priest, more practical and religious than that of the lecturer,—must kindle the soul of the true minister of Free Religion. To him a definite object presents itself, unselfish, absorbing, profoundly earnest,—before his eyes there ever floats a supremely beautiful ideal which concerns the human life of to-day, and is not satisfied with intellectual amusement or even intellectual instruction. If he is worthy of his high opportunities, he will throw his entire being into the practical task of lifting humanity up to a higher level, not by bringing to bear upon it a system of ropes and pulleys, or by subjecting it to any external mechanism of screws or levers, but rather by developing those internal spiritual forces which are now repressed so injuriously by social restrictions and individual vices. To touch and deepen and enlarge, on the one hand, the fountain-head of noble character in the individual soul, and on the other to concentrate the combined powers of mankind upon the spiritual and universal improvement of society,—this is the double aim which inspires the true minister of to-day, and which, if in any great degree realized, will make him the truest of benefactors of his race. Although I see plainly enough that the Christian priesthood, both in its stronger and more diluted forms, is passing away, I also see that it had its origin in human wants that cannot be fully met by Lyceum lectures. There is a work to be done by the minister of Free Religion which cannot be done by any other, until all men have become perfect,—a consummation certainly not yet to be expected. The moral and religious aspirations of human nature will always demand expression in some distinctive and social institution; and though the church is passing away, something better is demanded in its place. Without pretending to predict precisely what this will be, I seek this morning to apply the ideas of Free Religion to our present wants, and explain the work which I conceive myself called to do. Doubtless our methods must be, to some extent, provisional only, adapted to a state of transition; but taking things as they are with an earnest purpose to make them better, I believe that both you and I will find a grander sphere of activity on the new, than on the old, basis. What, then, am I to be to you?

The word minister, derived from the Latin manus, a hand, means etymologically a laborer or servant; and in this sense I accept it. I am to be a servant of truth and humanity,—therefore a servant of God, and a fellow-servant with you. But I am not going to be a minister or servant of the First Independent Society alone, seeking to promote its interests as an organization above all things else. No—I shall seek to promote the interests of truth and humanity first and last, hoping that I shall thereby promote your corporate interests as well; but if ever your corporate interests should conflict with those of truth or humanity (a case I believe very little likely to occur), I shall certainly sacrifice the special to the universal. Neither here nor elsewhere could I enlist as a party-man, to whom the welfare of his party is the supreme good. The welfare of my cause is dearer to me than that of any party that may espouse it,—dearer, I hope, than my own welfare. Do not expect, therefore, that I shall make it any object of my ambition to fill this house with hearers, or to be able to say that every seat is rented; it is my ambition to speak here the highest truth that I can see, in the best form that I can attain. If the truth truly spoken shall not command a great audience, be very sure I shall not descend to any clap-trap to increase it. I am less anxious to be heard by the many than to render some service to the many or the few that come to hear. I shall measure my success among you solely by the amount of thought, of moral earnestness, of practical religion, that shall grow out of my words. If I shall find you becoming more manly and womanly, more religious and more philanthropic, I shall not ask whether you also become more numerous.

It would, indeed, give me pleasure to know that many are helped by what I have to say; but when I see what kind of men they are that draw the great crowds,—by what politic conformity and suppression of innermost conviction they too often stoop to draw them,—I feel that it is possible to purchase a congregation at too high a price. Quality is more than quantity. I believe I never yet urged any man to come to hear me speak; if he is not drawn by inward attractions,—if he is not prompted by the hope or expectation of gaining some good by coming,—I should be ashamed to beg the favor of his attendance by personal appeal. The Christian virtue of church-going is the invention of pigmy parsons, who must eke out an audience by creating the sin of absenteeism. What a malefactor is he, who recruits his congregation under false pretences, and ends by making religion a bore! Let us understand each other on this point,—church-going is no duty. Unless you are drawn hither by inclination, desire of self-improvement, or wish to help forward our movement for the sake of the public welfare, it is better for you to remain elsewhere. Our Sunday meetings should be as free and spontaneous as any other social gathering; their perpetuity must depend on their power of practical usefulness, in default of which they had better cease. I count it no part of your duty to attend these meetings, unless you find them instructive or beneficial to yourselves, or a means of good to the community. Never will you hear from me an appeal to come simply for the sake of coming; and whether your coming shall answer any important end, I leave it to you to decide. I would fain rise above that self-conceit of the preacher which Dr. Franklin so justly satirizes.

It by no means follows, however, from what I have said, that I regard my work as trivial or valueless to my fellow-men. For the work to which I have devoted my life, be very sure I have no apology to offer. The one great object of the ministry of Free Religion is to seek and to promulgate the highest religious truth,—to discover the universal laws which are inherent in human nature and apply them to the spiritual development of human society,—to ennoble the individual and to perfect the race by awakening a fuller consciousness and truer obedience of that in-born ideal which is the source of all genuine progress. To this object every other duty of the minister is subordinate; and in the pursuit of it he has need of all his manhood. It is no child's play to toil in the service of great ideas. These are revelations of God, granted to no priestly idler, but reserved for him who climbs the mountain of Truth with torn hands and bleeding feet. Wisdom is no free gift; God sells it at enormous price, and laughs at the impudence of the would-be burglar or thief. Is any one so simple as to believe that Newton happened by good luck on the great law of gravitation? That Laplace picked up the Nebular Hypothesis as a couple of lucky miners the other day picked up the great Australian nugget? That Grove and his fellow-savans stumbled over the wondrous theory of the Conservation of Force, fallen like a meteoric stone out of the sky? This would be the last extreme of folly. No great truth, whether in science or religion, was ever born into human consciousness save by natal throes. Seeking as he does to penetrate the secrets of the universe, that they may purify and exalt the mean living of man, the minister of Free Religion must pay to niggardly Nature their full gold value in patient study and persistent thought. His function is not that of a bank-cashier, disbursing funds accumulated by others; but that of a large-hearted merchant, winning afresh that he may freely bestow. The Christian priest simply draws a check on the Bible, made payable to those who believe such paper good; the minister of Free Religion modestly contributes to the public treasury what he has earned by the labor of his own brain. Unless, therefore, he earns daily, his contribution must sink to zero.

With this theory of the ministry and its object, it is apparent that my chief work among you must be on the one hand that of studying and thinking, and on the other that of imparting my results. Whatever interferes with this work, is outside of my special duty. As one of yourselves,—as a member of your society,—it is also my duty to put into practical operation the ideas and truths thus acquired. But this duty devolves upon us all alike, and is not especially mine. My peculiar work must be that of a "committee of one," appointed to investigate and report upon subjects which those have no time to attend to whose lives are devoted to the world's immediate business; but my report, though prepared with conscientious care, must be submitted to your final judgment, and approved by it, before it becomes the basis of our common action. It is my duty to discover, if possible, the best religious principles, the best religious objects, and the best religious methods; it is your duty to test these by your own independent faculties, and, if approved, to join me in working for them. I aspire to no personal leadership, leaving that to ministers of the Christian gospel; but I do aspire to understand and state clearly those great ideas which should lead both you and me in the conduct of our individual lives and the direction of our social activities. My conception of the right administration of our Society is strictly democratic; after the best light we can obtain on the duties of life, we should be guided in our work by the voice of the majority. Every great historical religion has its recognized leader, whose command is accepted as decisive of all moral questions and practical duties; Free Religion alone undertakes to dispense with leadership, and let the people lead itself.

Now to discharge properly the function of a minister, as thus defined, it is plain that the first requisite is leisure for study and thought. The preparation for good discourses must not be narrow or partial, but should embrace plans of comprehensive investigation. Other men are doubtless more highly gifted than I in the power of rapid work; but I cannot write two discourses a week without abandoning the studies essential to make them of much value. You will soon exhaust a cistern, if you pump water out of it faster than it runs in. The ratio between supply and demand must be equalized. During the summer, while we were still strangers to each other, and while my acquired material held out, I was willing to deliver two discourses a Sunday; but it will be impossible to continue this much longer. It is several years since I found myself obliged to concentrate all my energies on a single service; and the change proved equally beneficial to speaker and listeners. I wish, as early as may be, to submit to your judgment a plan for changing the character of the second meeting, so as to render it at the same time more useful to yourselves and less burdensome to me. [The plan proposed developed into the Radical Club of Toledo.]

A few words concerning the conduct of the Sunday meetings ought not to be omitted here. Readings from other books than the Bible are manifestly appropriate to the changed basis of our Society; and whenever I can find more fitting selections elsewhere than in the Hebrew or Christian Scriptures, I shall freely use them. Greater freedom, also, in the music,—a wider range and a greater variety in the pieces sung,—will, if attainable, enhance the value and pleasure of our meetings. I cannot see why hymns alone should be deemed appropriate to our meetings; and although there may be some difficulty in finding exactly what we want, it will be well to bear in mind the wisdom of seeking to add cheerful and more secular strains to the somewhat too solemn psalmody of the past. With respect to the more strictly devotional parts of the service, likewise, it has given me no small satisfaction to see that you are willing to allow perfect liberty of action to your minister. I explained my idea of prayer to you at some length, immediately after my arrival; and notwithstanding the strangeness of my innovations in this part of the order, and, I doubt not, the somewhat painful shock to old associations and established habits, you have commanded my sincere respect by permitting in the pulpit a freedom of action less easily accorded than the widest freedom of speech.

That all should be pleased at first with changes so important, I did not expect; but I believe, as time goes on, you will all find, in the freer atmosphere of our meetings, more than compensation for whatever has been lost. With regard to the benediction, I have hitherto said nothing, conceiving that my lecture on prayer contained all that required to be stated on this head; but perhaps in this I have erred. During last winter, I seldom occupied a pulpit, but gave frequent lectures in the City Hall at Dover on Sunday evenings. At these lectures I omitted all exercises beyond the lectures themselves and the occasional reading of a selected extract; and I thus became habituated to the omission of the benediction. The first Sunday that I preached here I gave the benediction, as had been customary; but during the week I analyzed a certain jarring sensation in my own mind, and perceived that it was one of those instinctive feelings that it is perilous to disregard. Reflection soon persuaded me that the benediction had its origin in the supposed power of the priest to pronounce a blessing from God after the absolution of sin,—a power not even supposed to be inherent in any Protestant minister. On the Protestant construction, the benediction must be either a prayer of petition to God or a polite form of dismissing the congregation. But prayers of petition are not in harmony with faith in natural laws; while the idea of degrading prayer to a mere form of dismissal is exceedingly repugnant to my sentiments of true reverence and propriety. Besides, the same objection of lifeless routine stands against the benediction which stands against any other regular prayer; and these various reasons combined convinced me that I should be deaf to the still, small voice within, if I consented to stifle my scruples out of an easy compliance with mere custom. It was no wilfulness or caprice that moved me, I trust, but a feeling that deserved profound respect. I have learned to heed such feelings as the saviors of character.

Having now explained that I regard it as my prime duty, supreme above all others, to prepare every week a discourse embodying the results of my most earnest search for truth, and to co-operate with you, as one of yourselves, in the practical application of truth to the improvement of society,—I wish to add a few words concerning what is commonly termed the "pastoral" function of the ministry. Very much of the so-called "pastor's" work is a mere relic of effete ideas, and wholly out of place in the ministry of Free Religion. Especially is this true of what is commonly called "pastoral visits." The theory of "pastoral visits" is, that the minister is charged with some special oversight of the moral and spiritual welfare of his people, and must therefore go the rounds of his parish several times a year as a matter of official duty. Let me say frankly that I recognize no duty whatever of making "pastoral visits;" that I shall not regard myself as in any way specially commissioned to keep watch over your morals, or to go the rounds of the Society so many times a year, or to make any official calls whatsoever. The social duties that are to exist between you and me will be precisely those which exist among yourselves; the same social customs and usages of calling will govern the intercourse between you and me, which govern your intercourse with each other. While settled as a Christian minister in Dover, I faithfully carried out what I then regarded as my "pastoral" duties. In a little more than three and a half years, I made seventeen hundred calls, spending a vast deal of time in this way which I now regard as utterly wasted. I called again and again on some who never called on me in return, and who seemed to derive no benefit from my visits except the privilege of saying that "the minister" had called on them, and comparing notes with the neighbors on the subject.

The system of "pastoral visits" is a millstone about the minister's neck, and accomplishes no good worthy of the immense outlay it requires in time and patience. The minister of Free Religion is simply one member of the Society, and will govern himself in all his social relations precisely as the rest govern themselves. Every such society must be an association of equals. When I come to see you, as I doubtless shall if you encourage me to do so by coming to see me, it will be as a friend, not at all as a pastor. It is not because I am averse to social intercourse, that I refuse to recognize the duty of "pastoral calls,"—on the contrary, I highly enjoy it on the natural basis. But I regard it as utterly profitless to spend half my time in a round of mere official idling; my time is too precious to be thus thrown away; and what portion of it is to be devoted to social enjoyments, will be devoted according to natural affinities rather than artificial relationships. If in any way I can be of any service to any one, it will be a high privilege to be summoned to it; I trust I shall never be backward in answering a call upon my sympathy or my assistance. Especially in times of trouble, if I can help any one of you, I believe you will not have to ask me twice, though I shall scruple to intrude upon sacred privacy; but let our social relations be as simple and direct as those of common life, without the stiffness and formality of mere officialism. As a pastor, I promise and expect nothing at all; as a friend and neighbor, I hope to be admitted to your confidence and your goodwill. I want to do good among you, and to do all the good I can; but let it be on the honest ground of our common human brotherhood, not on the factitious ground of peculiar official duty. Free Religion strips off the shams, and brings us down to realities; and it is because I long to make my ministry among you a real and wholesome thing, that I cast away as rubbish all the tawdry trimmings and trappings with which the Christian ministry is made unmanly and ridiculous. White neck-ties and black gowns belong to a past age; let me be your fellow-servant in a great cause, trusting only to natural methods and the sweet instincts of natural, sincere human life. So far as I can be of service to you as a friend, I trust you will never find me wanting; but the notion that I am to be a "shepherd," and you a "flock of sheep," needing to be tended and protected from imaginary wolves, is too absurd to be entertained. I discard entirely the sheep-theory of the minister's work. My one great duty is to seek for truth, to impart it when found, and to labor for its practical application in all possible ways in conjunction with you. The best methods of doing our work as a Society should be discussed freely among ourselves, determined by the voice of the majority, and then acted upon with energy and unanimity; and I postpone further consideration of them until such discussion can be held.

UNIVERSALISM.—An Orthodox minister, in the Advance of Sept. 15th, writing of Universalism, asks, "How shall we deal with it?" and, in answering it, says that, in teaching the doctrine of "eternal punishment," they must "beware of using feeble arguments in supporting it." Excellent! but to obey this would be to abandon all the arguments now used to support a doctrine which is opposed to both reason and the Christian Scriptures.—Liberal Christian.

SOME one wishing to annoy a gentleman with a large mouth, asked him if he had a long lease of that mouth of his, when he was good-humoredly answered, "No, I have it only from year to year."

CONCERNING MEMORY.

I translate from the Boston "Pionier" the following, credited to the "Nene Freie Presse," of Vienna.

G. M.

TOLEDO, O., October 1, 1870.

At the annual session of the Academy of Sciences in Vienna, Austria, Professor Ewald Hering delivered an interesting lecture on MEMORY AS A GENERAL FUNCTION OF ORGANIZED MATTER. He cast important rays of light on the darkest points of zoology, especially on the remarkable questions concerning the nature of instinct and the inheriting of peculiarities. Considering the great interest taken in such questions in large circles since the appearance of the Darwinian doctrine, we will acquaint our readers somewhat with this important discourse.

In the commencement Prof. Hering discussed the relation between Psychology and Physiology, and deduced from the normal dependence between the spiritual and material the connection between the two sciences. He considers the phenomena of consciousness as functions of the material changes of organized substance, and—to prevent any mistakes, he particularly emphasizes this point—therefore also in return the material processes of cerebral substance as functions of the phenomena of consciousness.

This does not assert that they bear the relation of cause and effect, but only that a change in one set of phenomena is accompanied by a change in the other. By the aid of the hypothesis of functional connection between the spiritual and material, Physiology is at present enabled to draw the phenomena of consciousness with success into the circle of its investigations, without leaving the solid ground of the exact method of natural philosophy.

After this exposition Prof. Hering defines it as the purpose of his lecture—"to consider in connection a long range of phenomena apparently far separated, which belong partly to the conscious, partly to the unconscious life of organisms; to bring them under one point of view as manifestations of one and the same fundamental capacity of organized matter, that is, of its memory or power to reproduce." He discards that definition of memory which declares that it consists only in our ability to reproduce at will conceptions or connected representations. He extends the idea of memory to all involuntary reproductions of perceptions, imaginations, sentiments and volitions, and infers, from the phenomena of the memory of the senses and from a succession of ingeniously combined considerations and reflections, that the physiologist has to consider memory, in a more extended sense of the word, as a capacity of the cerebral substance of the brain, whose manifestations, for a considerable part, take place consciously; but for another and equally essential part take place solely as unconscious material processes. The extraordinary influences which practice exerts on the dexterity of our motions, citing, for instance, in explanation, the remarkable performances of a pianist, the lecturer refers to this unconscious activity of memory. What we call the power of habit, he maintains, is the power of memory. So we see, he continues, that it is the memory to which we owe almost all that we have and are; that representations and ideas are its work; that it produces every perception, every thought, every motion. Memory connects the numberless single phenomena of our consciousness into one whole; and as our body would be separated into numberless atoms but for the attraction of matter, so would our consciousness be shivered into as many splinters as it counts moments without the binding force of memory.

The first part of Hering's lecture having thus assigned to the memory of the individual a more extensive importance than is generally conceded, the second part enters upon a series of facts from which the power of memory appears still more imposing, and which relate to the part which memory plays in the life and the development of the animal world as a whole. Here are thrown those new lights on instinct and inheritance which we mentioned at the outset. We will therefore give this second part of Hering's lecture to our readers entire, as follows:—

"In consequence of numerous facts, we are justified in assuming that such properties of an organism as it has not inherited, but has only acquired under the peculiar circumstances under which it has lived, may be transmitted to a descendant; and that in consequence every organic being transmits to the germ which springs from it a small heritage which has been acquired in the individual life of the maternal organism, and has thus been added to the great heirloom of the entire species.

If we consider that this refers to the transmittance of acquired properties which have been developed in the most various organs of the maternal being, it must appear enigmatical in the highest degree how these organs could have any such influence on the germ, which developed itself in a distant location; and therefore all sorts of mystical views have entered into the discussion of this question.

Through the following considerations, this question is approached by the physiological understanding:—

The nervous system, notwithstanding its thousand-fold distribution in cells and fibres, forms still a continuous whole, and is connected furthermore with all the organs; directly (as modern histology supposes) with every cell of the more important organs, or, at least, indirectly through the living, sensitive, and, therefore, conducting substance of other cells. By means of this connection it is possible that all organs are dependent on each other to a greater or less degree; that the changes of one find an echo in the other; and that of any irritation, produced by whatever cause, information, however obscure, penetrates to the most remote parts. To this light-winged intercourse of all parts among themselves, carried on by the nervous system, is added the more ponderous, carried on by the circulation of the blood.

We perceive further, that the process of the development of germs intended for an independent existence exercises in their very first beginning a powerful retro-action on the conscious and unconscious life of the whole organism. Does not this indicate that the organ for the formation of germs is in more close and important relations with the other parts, and especially with the nervous system, than the other organs; and that therefore in return the conscious and unconscious fate of the entire organism meets a more ready echo in the ovary than elsewhere?

This shows plainly the way in which lies the material connection between the acquired properties of an organism and that peculiarity of the germ, by which the latter becomes enabled to reproduce and develop these maternal properties or qualities. It cannot be objected that it could not be surmised that, in a germ apparently so like another, the specific manner of its material composition, and not rather an immaterial something, was directing its future development.

The forms of curves and planes which the mathematician conceives and finds conceivable, are more numerous and manifold than the forms of the organic world. If we imagine infinitely small portions taken from any possible curve, all these minute segments will be more like each other than one germ to another; yet in every such segment lies latent the whole curve, and if the mathematician produces it, it can only be produced in those directions which are determined by the properties of the small segment. It is, therefore, an error to suppose that such fine distinctions in the germs as physiology must accept are impossible to be conceived. An infinitesimal dislocation of a point or a complex of points in the segment of the curve is sufficient to change its whole course, and so is an infinitely small influence by the maternal organism on the molecular construction of the germ sufficient to determine its future development.

But what else is this re-appearance of qualities of the mother organism, than the repetition by the organized matter of such processes as it has once before shared, if only as germ in the ovary, and which it remembers now, time and occasion favoring,—similar or identical irritations reacting in the same manner as formerly in the organism of which it formed a part, and by whose fate it was moved? If by long habit and thousandfold exercise of the mother organism anything becomes to such a degree its second nature, that even the contained germ-cell becomes impressed with it in ever so remote a manner, and this cell becomes a new being, extends itself, and forms a separate existence, whose several parts are only such of itself and flesh of its flesh, and it reproduces then what it once shared as part of another larger being,—then this may be quite as wonderful as when the old man suddenly recollects the incidents of his earliest childhood, but not more wonderful than this. And whether it is still the same organized substance which reproduces what it has once lived through, or whether it is only a descendant, a part of it, which has grown or become large, this is evidently only a difference of degree and not of essence.

But we are considering how unimportant acquired properties of the maternal organism can be reproduced in the infantile; and we forget that the whole organism of the child is nothing else than a single, enlarged, and most minutely detailed reproduction of the maternal. We are so accustomed to accept the similarity between the two as a matter of course, that we are often surprised if the child is unlike the mother in some respects; while the cause of greatest astonishment is that it is like her in so many thousand respects. But if the substance of the child can reproduce what the organism of the mother has only acquired during her individual life, should it not be much more able to reproduce what was innate in the mother-being and what happened for untold generations in the same organized matter whose minute fragment the germ is to-day? Shall we be surprised that what the organic substance has lived through innumerable times is impressed deeper into the memory of the germ, than what it has performed but just now in the course of its only life?

"Mamma," said a child one Sunday evening, after having sat still in the house all day, like a good child, "have I honored you to-day?" "I don't know," replied the mother; "why do you ask?" "Because," said the little one, shaking her head sadly, "the Bible says, 'Honor thy father and mother that thy days may be long;' and this has been, oh, the longest day I ever saw."

TEN THOUSAND CABINET ORGANS PER ANNUM.—Mason & Hamlin, the famous cabinet organ makers, are again obliged to add to their manufacturing facilities, which have been doubled about every three years since they commenced business. So great is the reputation of their work and so large the demand for it that there has been no time for years when they have not been largely behind orders. Recently they purchased some two acres of ground in Cambridgeport, on which is now completed another large new factory. This, with their other factories, will give them capacity to produce two hundred cabinet organs each week, or over TEN THOUSAND per annum. They are, of course, much the largest manufacturers of this class of instruments in the world.

They are introducing improvements in their organs, the present season, which they regard as very valuable and for which patents were granted them in June and August last.—Boston Advertiser.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"My wife and I are coming to respect your position so highly that I gladly renew my subscription, and send you two dollars herewith. All my life and my wife's is tending towards your position, or at least one parallel to it.

I think I can answer your question to me and other Radicals—"Do you or do you not believe that Jesus is the Christ in the New Testament sense of the word?"—very easily. I answer it simply by another question—Who does? The Orthodox or Trinitarians certainly don't, for they raise him up far too high for the New Testament, (as Unitarian divines have fully shown). We Radicals really disregard the literal sense of the New Testament not a bit more in one direction, than they do in the other. So if, as you say, only those who believe that Jesus is the Christ in the New Testament sense are Christians, I don't see that anybody, except perhaps a few Channing Unitarians, have any right to call themselves Christians. Indeed, even these Channing Unitarians, who defend the New Testament view of Jesus with equal zeal against Radicals and Orthodox, do not themselves literally accept his most solemn declarations, for which he was crucified, that he was to return in a few years in the clouds of heaven; see Matt. xxiv, 34; xxvi, 64; Mark, xiv, 62-64, etc. So until you can give a clear definition of what Christian means, as I shall be glad to have you do in print, I shall not repudiate that name, though I don't hold it very ostentatiously. I hope you will find this point worth public notice, also these two in reference to J. F. Clarke's reply to you.

First. He denies that Jesus attacked any Pharisee personally, because he never attacked any by name. Merely naming a man is not necessary to a personal attack, indeed often weakens it, as we see at Washington every day. In Luke xi, 37-44, is a speech of Jesus to a Pharisee with whom he was dining, which seems to me about as personal as anything could be, and not very consistent with the position of Jesus as guest. If you care to print this passage, or a few verses of it for Mr. Clarke's consideration, please do so.

Second. Mr. Clarke thinks that Socrates, if he had known Jesus, would have turned Christian. Now this is rendered very unlikely by the fact that Philo, Seneca, and other contemporaries of Jesus, who could best be compared to Socrates, did not show any leaning to Christianity. They and their successors evidently considered it merely a vulgar superstition. Acts, xvii, 18-32, show how the Athenian philosophers opposed Paul, who in many passages in his epistles shows that there was no sympathy between them, as I Cor. ii, 18-20; I Cor. i, 19-26. Indeed, Robert Browning, in the last lines of his 'Cleon,' which I will transcribe, shows clearly how the philosophers looked down upon the early Christians.

I cannot tell thy messenger aright
Where to deliver what he bears of thine
To one called Paulus—we have heard his fame.
Indeed, if Christus be not one with him,
I know not, nor am troubled much to know.
Thou canst not think a mere barbarian Jew,
As Paulus proved to be, one circumcised,
Hath access to a secret shut from us?
Thou wrongest our philosophy, O king,
In stooping to inquire of such an one,
As if his answer could impose at all.
He writeth, doth he? Well, and he may write;
Oh, the Jew findeth scholars! Certain slaves
Who touched on this same isle, preached him and Christ;
And, as I gathered from a by-stander,
Their doctrines could be held by no sane man.'

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meeting next Sunday evening, October 16, at 7½ o'clock, in LYCEUM HALL. The public are cordially invited.

A social meeting of this Society will be held at the residence of S. D. CURTIS, Esq., on Michigan St., Friday evening, at 7½ o'clock. All the members are particularly desired to be present, to discuss plans of action for the ensuing winter, and to make provision for carrying them out.

RADICAL CLUB.—It is hoped that a place of meeting for the Club can be announced by next week.

Poetry.

GOOD-BY.

I hear the creaking of the ropes,
I scent the salt breeze sweeping free,
And, floating on the bay, I see
Thy barque, full-freighted with our hopes.

The sea-gull swoops and dips the wing;
The long waves roll their solemn speech
Along the smooth curve of the beach,
And far the shattered sunbeams fling.

I pause upon the cold, wet sand,
And, like a man that wakes and dreams,
Nor parts what is from that which seems,
I hear thy voice and hold thy hand.

Methinks, what now I see I saw;
The present and the past I fuse;
Dead days revive; I cannot choose
But watch the hours in silent awe.

We heard the same low, summoning sound,
We travelled still a common road,
And oft we found ourselves with God,
And spoke to each of what we found.

And when the deep wound that was mine
Drew from my lips the unwilling moan,
And anguish claimed me for her own,
Thy hand poured in the oil and wine.

Ah, friend! I may not trace the way
Our feet in unison have fared,—
It dies upon this sea-floor bared;
Now dawns to me a dreary day.

I linger on thy brave farewell,
I watch the bright oars glint the sun,
I see the stout barque deftly won,
I mark thee on the ocean-swell:

Above the far horizon's brim,
The tall mast, yet unvanishing, peers,
Till with the strain—or is it tears?—
All things within my vision swim.

And shall we live in one no more?
Ah, well! the tide comes leaping in;
The love shall be that once hath been,—
I'll meet thee on the Other Shore!

The Index.

OCTOBER 15, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

Especial attention is called to Prof. Hering's lecture on our third page, which Mr. Guido Marx, of this city, has kindly translated for THE INDEX. It is worthy the closest study of all who are interested in the great problems of biology.

We have not yet received the continuation of Rev. Mr. Collyer's reply to Dr. Bland, but hope to do so before our next issue.

A CHAPTER OF PARAGRAPHS.

The essay in our present number was read on the Sunday following the reception of a formal invitation to settle in Toledo with the First Independent Society. Although Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, very kindly volunteered to assist at our "installation," we preferred to dispense with all ceremonies not in thorough keeping with a stand unequivocally outside of Christianity, and "installed" ourself, not as a clergyman, but simply as an individual speaker and worker for ideas. The fact that this essay concerns the general subject of "radical free churches," which has been considerably discussed of late in our columns, induces us to waive our reluctance to publish what is so closely connected with local matters, and to give it as a contribution to that discussion.

The "National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches" will soon hold their fourth fight over the "preamble" in New York city. All that will be gained will probably be a little nearer approach to the "split" that is already near, between the conservatives and the radicals. Some dissatisfaction is felt because New York is chosen the third time as the battle-field, the Conference having been thus far only once held outside of the "metropolis." These various battles will have to go down in history as "Bull Run the first," "Bull Run the second," etc. For the benefit of the future Unitarian Homers, we suggest that the Conference consider the exigencies of epic poetry, select places with sonorous names for their conflicts, and then proceed to "preamble-ate" throughout the entire country.

To the generous friends whose efforts in behalf of THE INDEX are doing so much to increase its circulation, we desire to return our warmest and sincerest thanks. Several good clubs have been recently formed in different localities through their exertions; and we would respectfully urge our other friends to form similar clubs elsewhere, that THE INDEX may begin its second year with a doubled subscription list. Do not wait till the first of January before making the efforts which have been so abundantly promised. Bis dat qui cito dat—he doubly gives who gives at once.

The staid and conservative Christian Register argues its own case as follows:—

"OLD AGE.—Old age is a public good. It is indeed. Don't feel sad because you are old. Whenever you are walking, no one ever opens a gate for you to pass through, no one ever honors you with any kind of help, without being himself better for what he does; for fellow-feeling with old age ripens the soul."

What a ripened soul the Register must have by this time! It has been "fellow-feeling" with aged ideas so long, that it is now positively—mellow. Politeness forbids a more scientific term.

Trusting that friends who have kindly obtained for us names of new subscribers will not think us importunate, we would remind them that the more numerous the copies circulated in any place, the easier it becomes to increase the circulation there. THE INDEX gratefully acknowledges the receipt of the first buckwheat,—and modestly requests another to keep it warm!

"I honor that man," says Emerson, "whose ambition it is, not to win laurels in the state or in the army, not to be a jurist or a naturalist, not to be a poet or a commander, but to be a master of living well."

It will be no matter of news to the readers of THE INDEX to say that Mr. Frederick Douglass has become editor-in-chief of the New National Era, Washington, D. C., or that this fact is a sufficient guarantee that the paper will be conducted with brilliancy, ability, and high principle. When we read at the close of his Salutatory these words to his friends—"I will end . . . by giving you my heart and hand, in spirit at least, and by asking your hearts and hands in return,"—we inwardly responded—"Yes, here are ours, sincerely given!" Nor will any man with brains enough and soul enough to appreciate such sentiments as these, fail to give a like response:—

"I assume, at the outset, that no man will look to this journal, so far as I am concerned, for any merely selfish utterance as to race, country, or color. To the former slave I say, I too am a former slave; to the colored man I say, I too am a colored man; and to the Indian, Mongolian, Caucasian, and to the men of every nation, kindred, tongue, and the people of all latitudes, longitudes, and altitudes, I say, that I too am a man, and would scorn to demand for the men of my race a single right or privilege that I would not freely grant to you.

Let me also say, that no man need expect anything from my pen of a sectarian character. All who labor to lead our people out of the wilderness of social, moral, and physical evils, of whatever religious opinions, will be hailed here as 'countrymen, clansmen, kinsmen, and brothers beloved.' We shall deal with the known and visible interests of our people, and aim to promote them in every possible proper way. Here is ground enough for all reasonable men to stand upon. The ignorant, superstitious, and bigoted who lose sight of the fact that men have to live as well as to die, may quarrel with this liberal platform; but such men are exceptional, and will ultimately follow the line of progress here as elsewhere."

The Revolution, reprinting the paragraph headed—"Not a Fit Woman for Suffrage,"—which we copied in THE INDEX, No. 36, from some now forgotten source, adds the following note:—

"This story, under the head of 'Not a Fit Woman for Suffrage,' we clip from an exchange. But after carefully reading the facts in the case, we confess our inability to discover why this woman ought not to exercise the right of suffrage. Like Rosa Dartle, premising that we 'only ask for information,' we will accept the statement that she is not fit to vote; but may we meekly inquire, 'why not?'"

If THE INDEX is the "exchange" in question, we reply that the heading of the paragraph (not our own) was, we thought, transparently ironical. A woman who will cheerfully support herself and three children by keeping a toy-shop, and enable her husband at the same time to study medicine, certainly shows character and ability enough to fit her for the ballot, when her husband, who already has it, is at least under suspicion of being devoid of those qualifications. It does not do, in this queer world, to take everything in earnest. Perhaps we should have escaped leading our excellent contemporary (which, we are glad to see, is improving weekly) into this rather funny mistake, if we had placed at the end of the heading what the printers call an "astonisher," thus:—"Not a Fit Woman for Suffrage!" But, really, we are not grateful ourself, except in supernaturally obscure instances, for any attempt to explain a joke.

It is a noteworthy fact that the spiritual autocracy of the Pope rises to its zenith in the same year in which his temporal power sinks to its nadir. The Ecumenical Council is immediately followed by the Italian occupation of Rome. Soonest ripe, soonest rotten. The political does but antedate the spiritual disintegration of the Papacy, which is dying by inches.

A QUESTION.

Rev. J. S. Dudley, pastor of the Plymouth church, Milwaukee, defines God as the "Original Unity," the "summation of the possibilities within us." What thinks the editor of THE INDEX of it?

INQUIRER AFTER GOD.

[We think it very unsatisfactory, because it leaves so many questions unanswered. More than half a dozen words are required to express the idea of God, at once the sublimest and the most complex that the human mind can form. The above definition hints at important elements of this idea, but fails chiefly, we think, by representing as an abstraction the supreme Reality underlying all other realities, and by suggesting that the Infinite can be the mere "summation" of finite possibilities.—ED.]

WHAT NEED OF MINISTERS?

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 30, 1870.

TO THE INDEX:—In your 40th number is an article headed—"FREE CHURCHES AGAIN." A leading idea of the article is that the institution of a Free Church should conform to the ideas of a Free Church. Very well. What is the leading idea of a Free Church? Is it not the essential equality of every member of the human family, irrespective of nationality, race, color, sex, or even of profession? Is it not a leading idea of the Free Church that every human soul is, or ought to be, both a learner and a teacher, a discoverer and a propagandist of the truth? Has not each a natural, inalienable right to acquire and communicate all knowledge possible? If knowledge is the necessary means of salvation to one man or woman, is it not equally indispensable to all men and women? If these ideas are correct, then why have any man or woman selected as a professional teacher? If salvation must be wrought out by each for himself, ought not the pupil to know as much as the master? It seems to me that the Free Church should answer this last question affirmatively, and frame its institutions, its exercises, its modes of development with especial reference to that idea. I have in mind modes that may be adopted tending to that result; but they place no especial reliance upon "a man or woman of clear insight trained in thinking and utterance," but upon whole congregations of such.

EDUCATOR.

[The right of every person to think, speak, and act in perfect freedom, so long as the equal rights of others are not infringed, is unquestionably the basis of all free institutions; and for this reason we look upon all "church" organizations as certain to perish in a free country. However modified, the "church" is incapable of recognizing this democratic equality; and some organization like the "Radical Club" is, in our judgment, destined to supplant it. It does not follow, however, that the thoughts and words of all persons will ever be equal in value to the world, or equally worthy of attention. Inequalities of education, opportunity, and natural ability will doubtless always exist; and the world has a fashion, not speedily to be abolished, of listening most attentively to the best. Until all men are equally wise, they will continue to hearken to the wisest of the race; and we suspect that there will long be a demand for powerful intellects educated to think on the highest subjects. It is true, nevertheless, that ideal society will have no need of individual instructors; and, paradoxical as it appears, the function of radical instructors is to make themselves unnecessary as soon as possible. Speed the day!—ED.]

NO CAUSE FOR DESPAIR.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:—A writer in THE INDEX, 24 Sept., informs us of the failure of congregations or ecclesiastical organizations based on the principles of Free Religion. He speaks very reasonably and properly on the subject; but he evidently regrets the failure. It is not the failure, but the attempt, that should be regretted. Is not the heart the place, and every day the time, to commune with God? Is it not better to turn our back on the lies of the pulpit, and our face towards the poor, the sorrowful, and the ignorant? What business have we to keep up the useless practice of putting the new wine of Free Religion into the old bottles of sectarianism? Was not the revolution of the sixteenth century called into existence that men might enter on a career of freedom from the bonds of a shallow and hypocritical formalism? Is not God's true congregation assembled, and his true worship actually going on, when every man and woman is diligently at work at his and her proper trade or business?

The religion of Jesus was free religion. He himself was a free religionist. He did not love the pompous worship of the Temple. His religion was to go about instructing the ignorant and doing good. He did not want that men should go with the Samaritans to Mount Moriah or with the Jews to Jerusalem; but with their own hearts and feelings to worship God in spirit and in truth. Would that those who make him a god would love him as truly and imitate him as closely as those who believe him to be only man!

If great churches and overflowing congregations be the sign of true religion and its prosperity, the Catholics are ahead of all other religious communities. Is not the mere mention of this enough to make us ashamed of our longing to return to the flesh-pots of Egypt?

Let no one despair of the success—the triumph—of Free Religion, because it cannot show itself under old forms. It is free thought; and free thought is the garden of God, where the flowers of intelligent virtue exhibit their beauty and exhale their perfume for the healing of the nations.

Free Religion is spreading more widely and taking deeper root than many of its most warm friends can imagine. The writer of these lines is an Irishman, and was a zealous Catholic up to his sixtieth year. He is the father of a numerous family now living, and one of a considerable circle of Irish nominal Catholics, every one of whom is a free religionist. Think of this, and of the thousands of church-going Protestants whose deliberate and clear convictions are on the side of Free Religion, and you will see how groundless are the apprehensions of the friends of our sacred cause.

Churches with their congregations require a priesthood; but a priesthood, if it be not a sham, requires to be firm and durable; to be firm and durable, ignorance must be nourished and light proscribed in the congregation. Priestly tyranny will soon follow, hypocrisy will be the order of the day, and charity, though daily preached up by the creed-makers, will, by the creed-makers and by the creeds, be banished from the face of the earth.

LIBERTUS.

CAUSATION AND CONSCIENCE.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Sept. 18, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—I would not have troubled you with this, but by your reply to my last I see I did not express myself sufficiently plain to be comprehended by you. In your "Chaos and Cosmos," you showed clearly and beautifully that the general law running through all Nature was one of cause and effect. Yet you made an exception to the general law; for to deny the exception, you say, "would be the negation of all morals." I know you have always held this position and contended for it in your essay. The exception you make is what, I think, "so severely mars the beauty of the whole theory." My mind sees no need for the making of any exception to your general theory of cause and effect, and yet I think to deny the exception is not "the negation of all morals." The latter part of my article was to show that morals existed, though your exception to your general law had no existence. It was not to "amuse myself with a man of straw."

In the latter part of your reply, you say,—"If he desires to grapple the real problem, let him frame an exact definition of the word moral, which shall recognize the facts of conscience, and yet be consistent with the theory that every action is absolutely necessitated."

Now I ask, what conscience, whose conscience, and what facts of conscience are here meant? Conscience, and the facts of conscience as they exist in the human mind, are multifarious. The conscience of the Spartan boy who was taught that the sin of stealing consisted in letting it be known, is a very different thing from the conscience of the Christian boy who is taught the sin consists in the act; and the facts of those two consciences are twinges at very different points in the transaction. Man's judgment and conscience go hand in hand; and his conscience is wrong whenever his judgment is at fault. Whatever in the judgment of a man is right or wrong, conscience applauds or condemns. Conscience has shed more innocent blood than any one faculty of the human mind. It prompted the holy wars; it presided over the Inquisition; it has now declared the infallibility of the Pope. There are now, Mr. Abbot, plenty of consciences that would take off your head and mine, if they had the power; they would stop THE INDEX instanter. These would be disagreeable facts of conscience. And now do you still think, in order to grapple the real problem, I must "frame a definition of the world moral" that will recognize all these consciences, or any one of them and their facts, before I can justly come to the conclusion that every thought and act of man has its necessary cause?

To my mind, the proposition that any act or thought is without a necessary cause, and that that necessary cause is but (not?) a link in the great chain of cause and effect pervading universal Nature, is absurd; yet I by no means "negate morals."

L. T. I. has shown this up in a masterly manner, and I have no disposition to travel over his ground.

E. L. CRANE.

[The point of our previous criticism was that Mr. Crane understood our essay as containing a self-contradiction, which was to be found neither in that essay nor in our general position. If under "Nature" he includes (as he apparently does) moral actions, then we are constrained again to deny what he again asserts, namely, that the essay in question teaches that "the general law running through Nature is one of cause and effect." The "cosmos" we believe in includes both physical and moral law, the former only being one of cause and effect, while the latter, respecting human freedom, establishes the alternatives of self-approval for right conduct and self-disapproval for wrong conduct. Our theory may be erroneous; but it is certainly not "marred" by the self-contradiction of laying down a universal law to which it immediately discovers an "exception." The law of cause and effect (physical, in the largest use of that word) is without exception in its own sphere; and the same is true of the moral law. Mr. Crane's criticism is still upon a theory we have never advocated.

The alternatives above named are the "facts of conscience" to which we alluded. It makes no sort of consequence what particular acts are regarded as right, and what as wrong, in different ages and climes; these particular judgments, of course, vary greatly. The point we make is this, that, wherever conscience exists at all, it always makes the distinction between right and wrong; and always approves the one, while it always disapproves the other. The theory of Necessity has to explain away this fact, or ignore it, or evade its force in some way; and all argument for Necessity which does either of these things beats about the bush in vain. Until Necessarianism explains this approval and disapproval,—shows why a man must either approve or disapprove his own conduct, though he cannot help doing whatever he does do,—it is convicted of not recognizing plain, patent, incontestable facts. Neither "L. T. I." (beautiful as his essay is), nor any other able thinker, has ever succeeded in making it recognize them.

The truth is, Necessarianism, as commonly held, is an utterly illogical compromise between Fatalism and Freedom,—just as Unitarianism is an utterly illogical compromise between Catholicism and Free Religion. We want to clear away the fog about the main point, and confine the discussion to that. If every action has its necessary cause, self-approval and self-disapproval are sheer nonsense; and the words right and wrong lose all meaning. Let Necessarians bravely and frankly admit a fact which it does no sort of good to deny. But if human action is free at all, the absolute law of cause and effect does not govern it. Let believers in Freedom as frankly and bravely admit that. THE FIGHT IS BETWEEN FREEDOM AND FATALISM; AND ON THE ISSUE DEPENDS THE VERY EXISTENCE OF MORALS. It is this fact which lends all its interest to the conflict. What we want is to see the combatants meet each other face to face, all disguises dropped on both sides. To whichever side Truth shall award the palm, we will yield our allegiance. But we are tired of seeing Necessarianism fight itself by defending at the same time two utterly contradictory opinions.—ED.]

DEATH OF OLIVER WHITE.

The venerable liberal writer and land reformer, Mr. Oliver White, died of pleurisy, early on Wednesday morning, Sept. 28, after two months of severe illness, at his residence, 176 Grand street, New York city. He was buried on Thursday afternoon, the day following, at Greenwood cemetery. As he had no family, the funeral was attended only by some of his most intimate friends. Brief but appropriate remarks were made at the grave by Mr. Robert Walker, of this city, paying a very high tribute to the memory of our departed friend, whom he knew for the last forty years, and whom he believed to be true to himself and his fellow-beings; acting truly from his sincere convictions; working for the benefit of humanity; believing in Nature and Nature's laws; an honest, upright and conscientious man. Such was Oliver White.

The leading points in Mr. White's career are these. He was born in Massachusetts, 27th of August, 1799. He worked on a farm in New England until he came to New York, about forty years ago, and embarked in the shoe trade, which he carried on successfully for many years. Shortly after his arrival here he married an accomplished Boston lady, who, unfortunately, died about two years after their marriage, leaving a male infant who also died when about seven years old. As Mr. White never could speak of this terrible bereavement without intense emotion, we may safely attribute to this loss his subsequent morbid desire for solitary life. He has been a very prominent man during the days of Robert Owen, Frances Wright, Benjamin Offen, and numerous other reformers who figured at the Tammany Hall Infidel meetings in the days gone by. He sat as Moderator during the discussions at the Hall of Science,—an institution which existed in the city many years ago. And probably no man worked harder than he did, in the city, to keep up the celebration of the birth day of Thomas Paine.

About twenty-five years ago, Mr. White retired from active business and devoted most of his time to writing. He has published several pamphlets, namely, "On Banking," and kindred subjects, "An Expose of Methodism," "On Organization," etc., etc. His main work, however, and one that will live, too, is entitled, "An Inquiry into the History of the Originals of King James' Bible; When were they written? Where were they written? Who wrote them? And how have they been preserved and handed down?" It is a large octavo volume of 560 pages, of which he printed but a limited number at his own expense. In conclusion, he gives an excellent summary of Man's Nature,—Pathological, Intellectual, Physiological, Chemical,—as the most reliable standard by which we can measure or weigh the credibility of history and of revelation. Although this work has not been reviewed, as Mr. White said, it has, nevertheless, met with an appreciative welcome by those who have given it a careful perusal. Mr. White always referred to his book with pride,—and very justly too.

If ever a man truly devoted his life, labor and means for the welfare of the human race, Oliver White did. He was a self-reliant, frugal, temperate and industrious man. As he had no taste for luxury, he preferred to lead a solitary life,—which no hermit ever excelled. He worked earnestly and successfully in the interest of the Homestead bill, and recently in the Land Limitation movement. He contributed numerous articles, upon a variety of themes, which were published in the Investigator. His death deprives free inquiry of one of the most devoted and useful laborers; and the world at large has lost a good and great man.

[Mr. White's "Inquiry," above referred to, and we presume his pamphlets also, can be obtained by addressing Mr. Dion Thomas, 142 Nassau St., New York city. We take the liberty of mentioning this fact for the information of those who may be desirous of reading the work.

By the death of Mr. White, THE INDEX has lost a subscriber and friend.—Ed.]

“MOVER AND MOVED.”

MR. F. E. ABBOT:—Your correspondent, K. N., in No. 39 of THE INDEX advanced some antiquated arguments in favor of a "Mover" ("Creator") which I should have passed over without comment, if it were not that he referred to me and an article of mine on a kindred subject, which appeared some time ago in your valuable Journal. In doing so, he naively asked,—

"What does Mr. Einstein mean by spontaneity of matter? Does he not mean, after all, the same that we mean when we speak of the intelligent, indwelling spirit or principle that gives form and motion to all matter (and without which matter of any form whatever can have no consciousness of existence) that we express by the term—God?"

I am very sorry that I have no longer at hand the number of THE INDEX that contained my letter to you to which K. N. refers; however, I am pretty sure that I did not use the term, spontaneity of matter, in it. But whatever my expression, K. N. misunderstood it, and will learn now what I mean by saying that matter acts by spontaneity, when I shall have answered his questions and arguments in favor of a "Mover." And in spite of his "we," I believe that he speaks without your authority when he claims that I mean the same by it that "we" mean when "we" speak of the intelligent, indwelling spirit or principle which "we express by the term—God."

The fundamental error of K. N.'s reasoning arises, it seems to me, from his false notions of the nature of matter. In his first paragraph, he says:—

"I think it cannot be rationally and therefore not successfully affirmed that substance of any kind gave form to or took on form of itself; the immobility of matter must first be denied."

Does K. N. not know yet that matter not only "gave form to and took on form of itself," but is even now steadily, hourly, uninterruptedly giving form to and taking on form of itself, by virtue of Force (not, as K. N. claims, by "an intelligent spirit," indwelling or otherwise), the "Mover" of matter? If he does not know it, then it is time for him to study the works of younger and more scientific authors than he seems to consult, to make himself acquainted with their ideas on this subject, and to adopt their views in place of his own antiquated, untenable notions. By doing so he will learn that "Matter and Motion, as we know them, are differently conditioned manifestations of Force" (Spencer). If this be what he calls "the immobility of matter," then it "must not first be denied."

But he goes further on, and says:—

"If the immobility of matter per se be conceded, does not that necessitate the further concession, since matter exists, that matter had and has had a motor, and that matter and motor are not the same in kind; and does not motion imply the pre-existence of a mover and something to be moved; and does not the existence of forms necessitate the acknowledgement of pre-existence, of a former or maker and something to be formed?"

This complex of arguments in form of questions is but the old "watch-argument" of Paley in a new edition, clothed in a new dress. This latter, probably, became necessary because the old one has long ago been worn out. But this reasoning and argumentation is so well known, and has been long ago so totally demolished, that I need no longer dwell upon it. For this whole complex of arguments amounts but to—"Matter exists; ergo, it must have a motor." True, but this motor (Force), though "not the same in kind with matter," forms yet a constituent part of matter; and there is, therefore, no necessity of another motor, nor of another pre-existent anything, whether indwelling or outside of matter, to give it motion or form. All the difference in the forms of matter is but the consequence of the difference of its conditions. But, Force producing invariably the same forms where and when the conditions are the same, what further "necessity" is there or can there be for another indwelling or outside "spirit" or "motor"? Is it not plain that matter acts thus, "giving form to or taking on form of itself" merely by spontaneity? That it therefore neither has now, nor ever has had, any other motor?

But K. N. can't see this, and, contending for his pre-existing "former" or "maker" (Creator), will perhaps ask me—"But whence your Force?" And by that question he certainly could silence me, as I must admit my inability to answer it. For it requires a wiser man than either K. N. or myself to answer that question. But it would be not less staggering to him, if I in turn should ask him,—“Whence your pre-existent Former, Maker or Motor?” He could no more answer my question than I could his. The fact is, "we can only reason from what we know," and that man was not yet, nor ever will be, born of woman who could or can solve this question.

But K. N., in order to prove the correctness of his reasoning and the strength of his arguments, goes further on in putting questions, and asks:

"Does not the existence of intelligence reproducing forms necessitate and prove the pre-existence and concert of intelligence in the production of such forms? It will hardly be affirmed that even the simplest voluntary actions of men (the highest known forms of organic matter) are not prompted and performed by and under the influence and power of some kind and degree of intelligence. And if so, how can we entertain the idea that what we behold of the grand universe of organized matter exists and moves without concert of intelligence?"

Although K. N. calls it, further on, "absurd" to question his conclusions from these questions, yet I must do so at the risk of being (by him) considered absurd. Human intelligence can certainly be no parallel to "the intelligence of what we behold of the vast universe of organized matter," for that intelligence was, as K. N. argues, "pre-existent to that vast universe of organized matter;" must, consequently, if it existed or exists at all, exist independently and outside of matter; and thus have an existence for itself (i. e. be an entity), while human intelligence is but the result of, and totally dependent on, "the highest known forms of organized matter,"—man's organization. Consequently this intelligence, being resultant from the natural motor of matter, Force, can neither be parallel to, nor proof of, the existence of that intelligence. That (if it exists at all) must exist as an immaterial entity—and outside of matter.

The improbability, if not impossibility, of such an illogical intelligence existing either in or out of the universe, and of the giving of motion and form to matter by such a motor, is, as you, sir, will no doubt recollect, the burden of my letter addressed to you last March or April, I believe, and referred to by K. N., in which I contended for the existence of that vast universe of organized matter "by virtue of its innate Force (Spontaneity), and not by any other power, force or God." And yet K. N. naively asks—"What does Mr. Einstein mean by spontaneity of matter? Does he not mean, etc.?" Will K. N. now understand what I mean by spontaneity of matter, and that it is, after all, not what "we mean and express by the term—God?"

Most respectfully yours,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, PA., SEPT. 25, 1870.

RUSSIAN NAMES.—The truest Russian word for their Emperor is not Tsar, but Gosudar, which rightly means master. Tsar is not a true Russian word, but was brought in by their Mongol conquerors, and does not mean rightly a great king, but a horde-leader; it is the Persian word Sar, a Head, likewise Head of House and a Horde, is early enough to be in the book of Genesis in Egypt as Sar-of-bakers, Sar-of-cupbearers, Sar-of-the-guard Potiphar. Cicero calls Cleopatra's man of business in Rome Sar, and with the Hebrew feminine ending it is our name of Sar-ah, she being the great Hebrew's half-sister and his wife; it is the Sanskrit Sura, and through the French Sieur and Sire, which is not the same word as Seigneur or the Latin Senior, but is Gaulish, and is Irish now as Soar, a man of good birth and a head workman. Tsar is the same word as our English Sir. The Russian for Head of a State is Gosudar, and Gosudarstvo means Empire and any Kingdom or Great State.—Portsmouth, (N. H.) Journal.

[In his "Histoire de Charles XII," Voltaire says that the word cear or tear meant king among the ancient Scythians, and has no connection with the Cæsars of Rome. In his "Histoire de Russie," the same author adds that it was probably derived from the Persian tshas. Strange to say, Worcester's quarto dictionary derives it from the Latin Cæsar!—Ed.]

Spurgeon, the well-known London preacher, occasionally gets off a good thing. A report of a late sermon delivered by him contains a sentence which will be as much appreciated here as in England. "Brethren," said Spurgeon, "if God had referred the ark to a Committee on Naval Affairs, in my opinion it would not have been built yet."

It is related that, as some friends of Campbell, the author of Hohenlinden, were leaving his room after a late supper, one of the number had the misfortune to fall down a long flight of stairs. The poet, alarmed by the noise, opened the door, and inquired, "What's that?" "Tis I, sir, rolling rapidly," was the immediate reply of his fallen friend.

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE CONVENTIONS.

Public Conventions under the auspices of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, are to be held this Autumn as follows:

At CINCINNATI, Tuesday evening, November 1st, and Wednesday, November 2d, through the day.

At INDIANAPOLIS, Thursday evening, November 3d, and Friday, November 4th, through the day.

At TOLEDO, Monday evening, November 7th, and through the day, November 8th.

Local Committees will give due notice of the place and hours for meeting in their respective towns.

The friends of reason and freedom in religion, the seekers after truth, all those who would have religion applied directly to questions of social reform and practical life, the foes of sectarianism, of superstition, of dogmatism, in the cities where the meetings are to be held and from all the country around, are urged to attend these Conventions. Let there be a grand rally. Those, too, who are not in sympathy with the Free Religious Association are cordially invited to attend.

Practical subjects, bearing on the vital issues of the day, will be discussed, such as "Radical Organization," "The battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition," "Bible Worship," "The Sunday Question," "The Relation of Religion to the State in America."

Able speakers will be present, prepared to address the Conventions on these subjects. Time will be allowed also for free discussion.

Among the speakers positively expected to attend all the Conventions are O. B. Frothingham, President of the Association, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, Francis E. Abbot, Thomas Vickers, Miss Lillie Peckham, and Wm. J. Potter. It is also hoped that John Weiss, and Col. T. W. Higginson will be present. Others have been invited.

Any newspapers interested that will make an item of this notice will confer a favor.

MONEY WANTED.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association are in need of money for carrying out the work which has been entrusted to them. They have been urged by friends and members of the Association to enlarge their plan of operations. This they have been very ready to do, trusting in the liberality of friends to furnish the funds that will be necessary for meeting the increased expenditure. The new work which has already been laid out for the present year will demand larger financial means than the Committee have had at their disposal in previous years.

It was voted at the Annual Meeting of the Association last May, that four Conventions, according to the judgment of the Executive Committee, be held during the year in different parts of the country outside of Boston, for the promotion of those principles on which the Association is based. It will be seen by the notice that precedes this article what the Committee are doing towards carrying this vote into effect. Three Conventions have been appointed in the West this autumn, and are to be held within the first ten days of November. Aside from consulting the convenience of officers and speakers, it is thought that by thus holding a series of Conventions near together the effect on public sentiment will be cumulative, and our force therefore more advantageously used than if the same Conventions were to be held singly at long intervals apart. In addition to the three Conventions that are advertised, it is proposed that the intervening Sunday shall be used by our speakers separately at several other points, where opportunity may be offered for presenting their views. Now to carry out this Convention-plan successfully, money is wanted. It is hoped that the local expenses of the Conventions may be met in the places where they are to be held and by collections at the meetings. But even if this shall be so, there will be other expenses which will not be thus covered.

There are some speakers whom it is very important that we should secure for the Conventions, who cannot afford to pay out of their own means the necessary expense of attending. Nor should it be asked of them. They are poor—poor in material goods, though rich in mental and moral gifts—and poor in some instances because they are radicals. We want to be able to say these persons, "Go to the Conventions, give us your help, give the people there your strong and thoughtful word; and we will see that you do not suffer in purse." And therefore we want money, for our Treasury is empty.

The Executive Committee have also decided to adopt this year the course of Lectures in Boston which have become known as the Sunday Afternoon Horticultural Hall Lectures,—the volunteer committee that has had the direction of them the past two seasons not desiring to continue the responsibility longer. These lectures, though given in Boston, are widely reported, and may be said to be national in their influence. It is hoped that they may be made to pay for themselves. But the expenditure involved is large, and money may be needed from the General Treasury of the Association to meet part of the cost. Some of our friends may be especially interested in this part of our work. Let them remember it in their donations.

The publication and circulation of our Annual Report makes another item of expenditure. It was voted at the meeting last May that the Report should be sent gratuitously to all paying members of the Association; that is, to all persons who contribute one dollar or more annually to our Treasury. This vote has been carried into operation with this year's Report, so far as we have had the Post-office address of contributors. The vote we think a judicious one. But one result of it is, that we must depend even more than heretofore on voluntary contributions for meeting the expense of publishing the Report. The sale of the Report has never paid the cost of printing it. We do not expect that it will. Yet to print and circulate it we deem a good investment for the cause which the Association represents. The Report this year is especially valuable, and should be circulated widely. It contains more carefully prepared papers, and is considered more representative of the principles and aims of the Association than any previous Report. Having printed it, we do not want to hoard it, but send it out broadcast. But we need money to pay the bills. And our friends will delight our Treasurer, and aid in circulating an excellent document at the same time, if they will purchase packages of the Report for distribution (or for re-sale singly) on the easy terms named in the subjoined advertisement.

This, then, is a sketch, friends, of what the Executive Committee of the Association are trying to do this year. To do it we want your donations and subscriptions. We assume your interest in the work, and have no hesitation in asking you for the means. The annual membership fee is one dollar. Send that, if you cannot send more. But send more, if possible,—all that your faith shall prompt and your convenience can spare. Send to the Treasurer, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston, or to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHERNEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. F. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA;" (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER,

CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

Two friends meeting, one remarked, "I have just seen a man who told me I looked exactly like you." "Tell me who it was, that I may knock him down," replied his friend. "Don't trouble yourself," said the other, "for I did that myself at once."

Rev. Mr. Hepworth rescued a friend from drowning the other day. He is called for this good deed, a fisher of men. His Church friends ought to allow him to have a creed as a reward of merit.—Zion's Herald.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SEASON OF 1870-71.

MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS

Important Improvements.

Patented June 21, and August 23, 1870.

REDUCTION OF PRICES.

THE MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO. have the pleasure of announcing IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS in their Cabinet Organs, for which patents were granted them in June and August last. These are not merely mere trifles, but enhance the substantial excellence of the instruments.

They are also enabled, by increased facilities for manufacture, to make, from this date a FURTHER REDUCTION OF PRICES on several leading styles.

Having completed and added to their former facilities a LARGE NEW MANUFACTORY, they hope hereafter to supply all orders promptly.

The Cabinet Organs made by this Company are of such universal reputation, not only throughout America, but also in Europe, that few will need assurance of their superiority. For years the Company have been unable to supply the constantly increasing demand for their instruments, being always largely behind orders, though producing about twice the amount of work of any other maker of instruments of the class. This extraordinary demand is evidence that they have been successful in carrying into effect two rules which it is their purpose to adhere to rigidly, so that they may be said to be principles of their business. These are:

1. To make the very best work, and only the best; availing themselves of the best results of inventive genius, every improvement, wherever effected, and every facility which highest skill, ample experience, and liberal use of abundant means can command.

2. To sell always at the lowest possible prices, reserving to themselves the least remunerative profit. As cost of production is diminished, prices are reduced, and they always print their lowest prices, which are therefore subject to no discount. The extent of their business and the enormous number of Cabinet Organs which they now have occasion to produce, enables them to employ various machinery, and a division of labor which would not be possible in a smaller business. They are thus enabled to make the present reduction in prices, and to sell their work at even less than the prices commonly demanded for inferior instruments, and less than the cost of production without such extraordinary facilities.

They now offer FOUR-OCTAVE CABINET ORGANS, in quite plain cases, but equal according to their capacity to anything they make, for $50 each. THE SAME, DOUBLE REED, $65. FIVE-OCTAVE DOUBLE REED ORGANS FIVE STOPS, with Knee-swell and Tremulant, in elegant case, with several of the Mason & Hamlin improvements, $125. The same, extra, with new Vox Humana, Automatic Swell, &c., $160. THE SAME RESONANT CASE, with new improvements, $200. FIVE OCTAVES, THREE SETTS REEDS, SEVEN STOPS with EUPHONIE, a splendid instrument, $225. TWO MANUEL CABINET ORGANS, FOUR FULL SETTS OF REEDS, NINE STOPS, $375. THE SAME, RESONANT CASE, with the new improvements, the finest instrument of the class made, $425, &c. Many other styles in proportion.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5 will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass. 27tf.

BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

SUCCESS.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Sunday evening, Oct. 9, 1870, at Lyceum Hall.]

"All the proud virtue of this vaunting world Fawns on success—howe'er acquired."

THOMSON.

There is a common opinion that the world worships the "almighty dollar." That is a mistake. The world worships success. If "crooks the pregnant hinges of the knee"—bows with an humble obeisance verging on absolute adoration—before the "successful" man; while the "unsuccessful" man it crushes with a pity that is at bottom a sneer. Talleyrand said of some one (I forget who) that he was guilty of "something worse than a crime,—a blunder." That is, he had simply failed; and in the eyes of the world failure is the worst of crimes. No matter how black you may stain your soul with fraud and falsehood and injustice, you can win the homage of multitudes on multitudes, provided only that you shun the disreputable extremes of murder, burglary, or highway robbery. The commission of these peccadilloes will, it is true, alarm society's instinct of self-preservation; and if you have a strong desire to indulge yourself in luxuries such as these, you must take the precaution to do so legally. For instance, to stop a man on the street by night, and help yourself to his pocket-book by the persuasive argument of a Colt's revolver, will indeed involve you in disagreeable consequences; but by some adroit gambling in stocks or some skilful mismanagement of a corporation under your direction to swindle a dozen widows and a score of orphans out of their last penny is no robbery, but rather proves you to be a shrewd business man. To cut your neighbor's throat with a butcher-knife may possibly bring you to the gallows, since it is not altogether a fact, as the New York rough rashly supposed, that "hanging is played out;" but to neglect the proper protections of life on a great line of travel, and thus indirectly cause one of those terrible catastrophes that bring death to many and untold agony to more, will not destroy your reputation as a first-class railroad president, provided you can contrive to pay great dividends on the shares. Stealing is not theft, and killing is not murder, if only done according to due forms of law. Trifles like these, if offset by energy, enterprise, and success, will not seriously lessen your influence or hurt your reputation with the world.

Succeed,—and within certain very wide limits you can do with impunity what you please.

In modern times, the great popular measure of success is money. Cash is the cure-all. Whoever gets it, no matter how, will make nine-tenths of mankind take off their hats to him. He may be as bloodless as a block of granite, or as conscienceless as a crocodile; but if he only has the knack of making money, he will win the open or secret admiration of ninety-nine out of a hundred. In fact, money is the commonly accepted standard, not only of commercial, but even of mental, values. If intellectual ability cannot make money, it is very generally despised, as an eccentricity disastrous to its possessor. Even the moral qualities which interfere with the practice of profitable tricks in trade, or spike the cannon of parties bent on a brilliant but unscrupulous business campaign, excite the positive hostility of all who are content with the current standards of right and wrong. "What's the use of quarrelling with your bread and butter?" is the common retort; "you must take men as you find them," i. e. in plain English, you must come down to their level, and not bring your priggish abstractions into real life. Money measures success; and success is the proof of the only ability which the world wants.

If, therefore, the world worships the "almighty dollar," it is only as a means to an end. The real misers, the lovers of money for its own sake, are few. What stimulates so many to pursue it so eagerly, is the passion for success, of which the accumulation of a large fortune is merely the most widely recognized test. It takes but a moderate sum, after all, to supply the actual wants of the body. A man may have all the wealth of the Rothschilds, yet he can only inhabit one house, wear so much clothing, eat so much food. All above the amount required for the gratification of natural wants and real tastes would be superfluity, were it not that the overplus ministers to the pride of success. It gives influence, respect, power among men; and these are superlatively sweet to the average palate. This, added to the mere pleasure of activity per se, is the reason why men toil like steam-engines to amass wealth, long after they have won enough to yield all that money can really contribute to their comfort. It is a certificate, legible by all, of success.

Now what is "success?" In the abstract, to succeed means to attain your end, whatever that end may be. But what this end is, becomes the main question. I find, consequently, that there are two kinds of success. The one is outward; the other is inward.

Outward success is the achievement of results which command the admiration of the world at large; and it is dependent upon this admiration. The results aimed at, as for instance a great fortune, political power, social distinction, wide reputation, and the like, are not really sought for their own sake, but for what they bring, namely, the applause of mankind. A man who should amass great wealth by means of open robbery, even if he should escape punishment through the loopholes of the law, would not be regarded as a "successful" man; the chief element of outward success, public recognition, would be lacking. So in every case. What constitutes the outward success is not achievement of the ostensible end, but of the real, underlying end, to which the other is merely a means. In other words, the attainment of a professed object by no means makes an outward success, unless the world votes it to be such. No man outwardly succeeds, unless the world votes him successful. To be sure, the world will give him this vote on very easy terms. He must only aim at something which the world values, and attain it by other than openly nefarious means; on these conditions, he is sure of the world's endorsement. Nothing which is absolutely injurious to society, whether in the end or the means, will be tolerated; but the easy-going public will wink at a great deal of selfishness in the one and a great deal of unscrupulousness in the other, and bestow its approving smile on the ability which knows how to carry its point against opposing odds. "Be honest, if you can just as well as not," it virtually says; "but at any rate be smart." The essence, therefore, of outward success does not lie in the mere gaining of your object, though this also is necessary, but rather in the public recognition, admiration, and endorsement which follow it. Outward success, thus analyzed, is seen to consist really in the approving suffrage of mankind.

But inward success is absolutely independent of the world's suffrage. He wins it who secures his own suffrage. His one vote outweighs the votes of millions. If the ends he aims at are high and unselfish, and if the means he uses are pure, and if he devotes himself to the accomplishment of such ends by such means with his whole heart, he inwardly succeeds. He secures the approval of an incorruptible judge. He wins the suffrage of his own soul. He attains the end he really proposes to accomplish, the calm approbation of his own conscience. Nor is any degree of outward success at all essential to this inward success. He may even draw down an avalanche of derision on his own head. The amphitheatre of the world may hiss and shout,—"A failure! A failure!" Thus it greeted the most successful man of the nineteenth century, old John Brown, swinging on that Virginian gallows which he did indeed, as Emerson declared, "make sacred, like the cross." Who that has read the old man's words at his trial, cannot bear the inward suffrage of that single soul overwhelming, overruling, outnumbering the multitudinous votes of a great nation? He who, like John Brown, can command this interior verdict, may fail of his outward end,—thousands of such have failed; and the suffrage of his contemporaries may be a unit in branding his attempt as abortive. Posterity may perhaps reverse the contemporary judgment, though often, I dare say, it does not; nor is it of the slightest consequence whether it reverses or confirms the false decision of the age. The whole contemporary world, echoed by all posterity to the crack of doom, may cry—"Failure!"—with one unbroken chorus of condemnation. But if the inward oracle of the breast cast its one vote approvingly, it stands true as the Eternal God that, though the man's attempt may be a failure, THE MAN HIMSELF IS A SUCCESS.

Thus two kinds of success offer themselves to human ambition. The one is outward, depends on the actual accomplishment of outward ends, consists in the admiring suffrage of mankind. But the ends may be low, and the suffrage of mankind may be a lie. The other kind of success is inward, depends on earnest effort to realize universal ends, and consists in the approving suffrage of the soul. It matters absolutely nothing whether mankind endorse it or not. It is indeed a delight to receive the approbation of others in the pursuit of wise and noble objects; the sympathy of the good is the sweetest encouragement that can come from without. But even this can be dispensed with. Hated by the bad, misunderstood and ignorantly condemned by the good, there are still left to him of pure purpose and conscious rectitude infinite depths of joy. His life may be a succession of outward defeats; but he himself knows it to be inwardly a victory and success.

Now which of these two kinds of success a man prefers, reveals unerringly of what stuff he is made. It is not always necessary to sacrifice either. I doubt not there have been many men signally successful in the eye of the world, yet equally so in the eye of the inner judge. But this is hardly the usual fact. Nine times in ten a man who is enamored of his ideal will be called to make sacrifices, hard enough to selfishness, but easy to love. And nine times in ten the man who is enamored of outward success will find himself driven to customary violation of his ideal, until at last he is scarce conscious of his own frequent lapses from high-toned principles. That is a crucial test of character which brings a man suddenly to himself, and compels him to choose deliberately between the outward prize he covets and the inward law he nevertheless discerns. If he loves the outward success so well as to be willing to immolate the pure inward ideal at its shrine,—if he decides it to be impractical, visionary, quixotic, to govern the transactions of common life by the highest standards, and then proceeds to act accordingly,—he will no doubt find himself one of a great army of unnumbered millions, all of the same mind, and all practising the same morals; but he as surely writes himself one of those who betray their own souls. There is no lack of such in the world—their name is legion; but it is none the less true that there have been, and still are, men who would let themselves be torn asunder by wild horses, rather than thus prove false to the God within. He who so loves the inward success of the soul, that to win it he is willing, if need be, to throw to the dogs the very bread at his hungry mouth, will find himself in company with those great, starry souls who, like Socrates, cheerfully preferred death rather than the sully of their self-respect by so much as one iota of conformity with evil. These have seen the glorious light, loved it, and been transfigured by it.

I shall not refute the possibility of this dazzling virtue, this inward success, if I choose to pursue the outward in its stead. I may turn my eyes away from its brightness with well-bred or ill-bred scorn; I may choose to cast in my own lot with the low ideals which are the world's idols. But I shall not thereby put out of existence the supreme, divine realities of the higher life; I shall only succeed in classifying myself with the voluntarily imbruted. The moral idea sifts mankind with remorseless accuracy; the coarse-grained go to one place, and the fine-grained to another. I may prefer whichever I please, the outward or the inward success; I shall only select my own companions, who will make me increasingly like themselves. My choice will only rank me with the morally great or the morally small, speedily assimilate me with them, and write itself out in every trait of my character. I might as well hope to unsettle the foundations of the universe as to change this law. I classify myself by the ideal I adopt. If I live for outward success, I descend continually towards those that are still lower than I. If I live for inward success, every hour shall lift me nearer to those that dwell upon the heights.

I wish that men in their hearts believed these truths—for truths they are, as surely as truth exists. I wish there were more who, instead of secretly despising the folly of carrying a high ideal into the common business and petty details of life, saw that this made the exact difference between real success and real failure in life. Success in the highest sense is wholly in my own hands. It hinges wholly on the reverence and obedience I determine to yield to my own ideal. There is no luck or chance about it. My outward plans depend on a thousand contingencies; and I shall be wise to hold them with a light grasp, ready to relinquish them the moment I am bidden to do so by the inner oracle. I do not choose to put it into the power of the world to defeat me in the aims to which I cling; I shall, then, cling only to aims which the world cannot reach. My success does not depend upon you, nor yours upon me. If I determine to succeed, you cannot hinder or stop me; the whole world cannot hinder or stop me; because the only success that I am resolved to win must be inwardly, not outwardly, achieved. I may be obliged to crawl through life in poverty and disappointment and neglect,—in sorrow, perhaps, and anxiety of mind; that I cannot help, if the price of the opposite condition is put too high. But it is for me, not for you, to say whether I have succeeded. I decline to submit my success to the world's vote; it must be determined by my own vote. The world has no rule by which to measure it. All this is said to itself by every independent spirit, the wide world over. What the people call success is indeed a doubtful and uncertain thing, subject to all the changes of fortune and a fickle public mind. But success of this sort, desirable as it may be, is not the supreme good. The lines of Addison should be engraved on every heart:—

"'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But we'll do more, Sempronius,—we'll deserve it."

What I have thus far said has been spoken of the two kinds of success which are open to individuals; but the same truths will hold good of our own Society. I wish to say a few plain words about the success at which we ought to aim, and the condition of it.

The usual test of Society success, you know, lies in two questions—"How much money can you raise? And how large a house can you draw?" Among ministers, of course, there would be some innocent prattle about the number of souls saved, church-members added, and so forth; but any Society that easily raises all the funds it needs, and constantly secures a full audience, would be voted successful by the community at large, and would command the respect and influence which visible success usually wins.

Now, without at all despising success of this sort, I nevertheless regard this popular test as lamentably insufficient. The real success of our Society, at least, can in no way be measured by them. What ought we really to aim at?

1. At educating ourselves by earnest thinking on the highest themes that concern us as men and women.
2. At applying the ideas we thus acquire to the perfecting of our own characters and the purifying of our own lives.
3. At emancipating the community from superstition, and diffusing the principles of liberal reform as far as possible.
4. At putting our own principles into practice by doing all the practical good we can.

These appear to me to be the chief objects at which we ought to aim; and it is plain that our success is not to be estimated by any standards popularly accepted. We ourselves must determine how much has been accomplished thus far. Allow me to remind you of the past year's work, that we may form some estimate of its real success.

We began last year by making a protest in behalf of spiritual freedom whose influence we never shall fully realize, but which I believe to be widespread and deep. This change of attitude towards Christianity involved the loss of many members of the Society, and various financial embarrassments; but the spirit in which these sacrifices were made commanded my sincerest admiration, and gave me great hopes of our future work. During the year we maintained our regular Sunday meetings, our Sunday School, and our Radical Club, besides holding Sunday School festivals and social assemblies. We started and sustained for several months, with some outside help, a Free Evening School for men and boys, and a Free Afternoon School for girls, at which I believe much real good was done. I dare say it will surprise you to learn that within the year, besides defraying the regular and also the unusual expenses of the Society, we raised nearly $500.00 for charitable objects in no-wise connected with our own interest, including about $50.00 for the sufferers by the terrible Avondale mine catastrophe, $105.00 for Wilberforce University (colored), $135.00 for the Orphan's Home in this city, and about $140.00 for the free schools; and we still retain something in our treasury. Besides all this (a very imperfect account of the year's doings), THE INDEX was started by members of our Society, and guaranteed by them at their private expense. Looking back over the year, I think I can safely say that, so far as my own work is concerned, I never accomplished so much for the cause of radical religion in any two previous years,—perhaps in all my previous years put together. We may well take heart, I think, from this glance at a year's honest work in a good, nay, the best of causes. It is work that will not be forgotten, but will continue its influences long after you and I shall have passed away.

Now I want to say to you that the outward success attained is enough, and more than enough, to encourage us, and embolden us for another year. But I reckon the inward success as far greater. Have we not all gained some new thoughts that will mould our lives henceforth—obtained clearer insight into great ideas and liberal principles—grown in mind by what we have all heard and said? Have we not all felt ourselves embarked in the grandest cause that can enlist the hearts of men? Have we not all done some unselfish work for humanity, looking for no reward, but content with the thought of doing our share in the world's advancement? Have we not all been visited by some divine dreams of a nobler life, a purer and sweeter character, a world made happy by the universal spread of love to man and the Infinite Benignity? Surely I believe it; and instead of being discouraged, as some of you have feared I might be, I never felt more earnest and undismayed in my life. I did not go into this work without deliberately counting all the cost beforehand, and I made up my mind at the start that a great outward success was not to be expected. If you only keep up your own courage, and persevere with earnestness, enthusiasm, and hope, you need have no fear that I shall ever be disheartened by thin houses or any other symptom of outward failure. If only twenty come, or a dozen, or only five, and if these few are in dead—no, in live earnest about it, I shall work on with you gladly, cheerfully, hopefully; and we shall succeed at least in the spirit we cherish and the motives that move us, even though we should see no outward fruit of our labors for long years.

But there are conditions of inward as well as of outward success. Our Society has worse foes than any that assail it from without; I mean, the indifference, the apathy, the deadness, that are so apt to paralyze radicals everywhere. I believe we shall succeed in every way, both within and without, if we have faith in our cause, willingness to work for it, and a public spirit that will refuse to limit itself by Society boundaries. These are worth more than any amount of money, or any number of members; and they will accomplish more. The mercantile or the business view of the case will not answer, for it never includes the real causes of success. Given faith and determination and industry, we can yet do wonders in liberalizing and elevating public sentiment; but if we lack these, we might just as well disband to-night. What we want is that mighty, unquenchable enthusiasm of ideas that burns away steadily in the depths, and does not manifest itself in little spurts of fire at the surface. We want no sentimentalism, but a rugged and indomitable purpose to work on for freedom and humanitarian religion despite all obstacles, all discouragements, all doubts, difficulties, and dangers. We want a spice of the heroic about us, friends,—something of the spirit that can't be pushed to the wall, and won't give up while life holds out. Our success is in our own hands; we can fail or succeed, just as we choose. And what I want to say is this,—that so long as I live, I mean never to haul down my flag; and that I will stand by you just so long as you will stand by me and by each other. As to failure, we can't fail, unless we go into moral bankruptcy. The universe is all on our side; and we shall succeed inwardly and outwardly, if we only stand stoutly to our guns, and do our best. But we must all make up our minds to work, and not expect that one man will be able to do the work of the whole. That idea is obsolete. We must meet together, consult together, think together, work together; or all my words will be empty wind. Remember, if we don't succeed, we ourselves shall be alone to blame. Success, the highest and noblest success, is ours, if we choose to pluck it.

CONCERNING MEMORY.

[Conclusion of Prof. Hering's lecture, translated from the German for THE INDEX by Mr. Guido Marx, of Toledo.]

"If we consider further how every organic being which lives to-day is only the last link of an illimitable chain of organic beings, which sprang one from the other, and inherited one from the other a part of their acquired peculiarities; and how everything tends to place at the beginning of this chain organisms of the greatest simplicity, comparable to those which we call to-day organic germs; then this whole chain of beings appears to us as the grand work of the reproducing power of the substance of that first organic form with which the whole development began. When this divided itself, it left to its descendants its properties; they acquired new ones in addition and left a new heritage; and every new germ reproduced the largest part of what had been experienced before, while the other part receded in its memory because changed circumstances did not incite to reproduce them.

In this way every organic being of the present stands before us as a product of the unconscious memory of organized matter, ever growing and ever dividing itself, ever assimilating new matter and returning other matter to the inorganic world, ever incorporating the new into its memory to reproduce it again and again and to form it richer and richer the longer it lives.

The whole history of the development of a more highly organized animal forms, from this point of view, a continual chain of recollections of the evolution of the grand chain of beings whose last link is this animal. Just as a complicated conception, through a hasty and (so to speak) superficial reproduction, comes to perfection through long and laboriously performed processes of the brain, so does the developing germ pass quickly and only hintingly (as it were) through a series of phases which, by the chain of beings the last of which it is, during an immeasurably long life only step by step attained development, and became fixed in the memory of organized matter. Often and long anticipated, and created into theories under various forms, this conception has only found a correct elucidation through a natural philosopher of the present day. For truth hides itself in manifold garbs before the eyes of those who seek her, until she stands unveiled before the eye of the chosen. But with the form, with the exterior and interior formation of the body, organ or cell, are reproduced also their performances. The chicken which has just broken its shell runs away as its mother did, when she had broken through hers. If we consider what exceedingly complicated combinations of motions and perceptions are necessary only to keep the equilibrium in running, we shall understand that nothing can explain the fact mentioned but the acceptance of an innate capacity to reproduce these complicated functions. Just as to the individual an after-exercised motion acquired in the course of his life becomes second nature, such also to the whole species becomes the function so often repeated by every member of the same.

The chicken is not only born with a great dexterity in its motions, it also brings highly developed perceptive faculties. For it picks forth with the kernels which are thrown to it. To be able to do this, it is not only necessary for it to see them, but also to estimate with certainty the location, distance and direction of every kernel, and to calculate with equal certainty according to these the motions of its head and its whole body. But this it cannot have learned in its eggshell. This the thousands and thousands of chickens have learned which have lived before it, and from which it is descended in a direct line.

The memory of organized substance is disclosed here in the most surprising manner. The slight irritation, as the light emanating from the kernel strikes the retina of the chicken's eye, causes the reproduction of a richly linked chain of sensations, perceptions, and motions, which have never met in this individual, and which nevertheless arrange themselves at the very beginning with as much certainty and exactness as if they had been practised a thousand times on the same subject. Such surprising accomplishments by animals have been usually looked upon as manifestations of instinct; and natural philosophical mysticism has busied itself considerably with this theme of instinct. But if we consider instinct as a manifestation of memory or the reproductive power of organized matter,—if we ascribe to the species a memory, as we must concede one to the individual,—then instinct becomes forthwith comprehensible, and the physiologist finds points to connect it with that great series of facts which we mentioned above as manifestations of the reproducing power. This does not give yet a physical explanation, but it brings it nearer.

The animal acts, in obeying his instinct, when it spins its cocoon as a caterpillar, when it builds as a bird its nest, or as a bee its cell, with consciousness and not as a blind machine. Inside of certain limits, it knows how to adjust its acting to changed circumstances, and is in this liable to err; it enjoys itself when the work progresses well, and feels displeased when it meets hindrances; it acquires skill, and builds its nest the second time better than the first; but that it chooses the first time so easily the most appropriate means to attain its purposes,—that its motions regulate themselves so well and intuitively, according to the end in view,—this it owes to the inherited contents of its nervous substance, which need only the impulse to be set in motion in the most appropriate manner, and to hit exactly upon that which is required.

Surprising skillfulness is easily acquired in a narrow sphere. Partiality is the mother of virtuosity. Whoever admires the dexterity of the spider in spinning her web, should not forget how narrow her other powers are, that she did not learn this art herself, but that numberless generations of spiders have acquired it step by step. And this, their art, is pretty much all that they do learn. Man grasps bow and arrow when his net catches no prey; the spider starves.

So we see the body, and (what is here the most interesting to us) the whole nervous system of the new-born animal formed and tuned for its connection with the external world, which it enters ready to respond to its influences in the same manner as its predecessors have done. Should the nervous system and brain of the new-born man be different from this?

Certainly men must learn with difficulty, where the animal is born master; but in return the human brain is at its birth much farther remote from the limit of its development than that of the animal, and it not only grows longer but also stronger than that of the animal. It may be said that the brain of man is much younger in entering the world than that of the animal. Animals are born precocious, and act forthwith precociously. It is like those wonder-children, whose brain is also born too old to be able to develop itself as richly, notwithstanding its large endowment, as that of others endowed less bountifully but with greater freshness of youth. The brain of man and his whole body has a far wider range of individual development; and a relatively greater part of it falls into the time after his birth. It grows under the influence of his surroundings on his senses, and acquires under such circumstances by individual impressions what the animal receives through strong generic impulses.

Notwithstanding, it is clear that we must ascribe, not only to the body generally, but also to the brain of the new-born infant, a far-reaching power of recollection or reproduction of that which had been developed variously in his ancestors, and by the aid of which he learns the practices required in life, in so far as they are not fully innate, much quicker and easier than would otherwise be possible. Only, what we call instinct in animals appears in a form more free, as disposition. The conceptions, of course, are not innate; but that they crystallize so easily and certainly from the complicated compound of sensations, is not the child's own work, but he owes it to the labor of many thousands of years of the cerebral substance of his ancestors. Experience has also shown generally, that those theories of the development of individual consciousness which let every single human soul (so to speak) begin anew in its development, and which deny all that is innate, as if the thousands of generations which existed before us had lived to no purpose for us, are remarkably in contradiction with the facts of every day's experience.

The realm of those processes of the brain and phenomena of consciousness which ennoble man, has not so long a past as that of physical wants. Hunger and the impulse to generation moved the oldest and most simple forms of the organic world; for them and for the means to satisfy them, therefore, the organic substance has the strongest memory, and the impulses and instincts based upon them take hold of man to this day with the power of an elementary force.

The spiritual life has grown slowly; its most beautiful blossoms belong to the latest epoch of the history of the development of organic matter, and it is not so very long that the nervous system has carried the jewel of a great and richly developed brain.

Oral and written tradition has been called the "memory of mankind;" and this saying contains truth. But there is also another memory in humanity which is the innate reproductive power of the cerebral substance, without which letters and language would be only dead signs for later generations. For the highest ideas—though they were a thousand fold eternalized in letter and language—are nothing to minds which are not ready for them; they must not only be heard, they need to be reproduced. And if, with the treasure of ideas inherited from general tradition to generation, the treasure of interior and exterior development of the brain were not increasingly transmitted,—if, with the thought preserved in writing, the power of its reproduction were not also bestowed on the coming generations,—letter and language would be for naught. The conscious memory of man is extinguished with his death; but the unconscious memory of nature is true and indestructible, and whoever has succeeded in leaving on it the imprints of his labors, will be remembered forever."

FREEDOM OF LABOR.

[By Lydia Marla Child, in the National Standard.]

I honor labor; I believe in labor. My father was a workingman, and I am a workingwoman, both theoretically and practically. Few who have any taste for literature have done so much of the manual labor of the world as I have done and still do. But I am opposed to the 'eight-hour law.' I dislike all monopolies; and a monopoly of labor seems to me as wrong, in spirit and principle, as a monopoly of grain or fruit. For men to combine together to fix by a forcing process the price of the article in which they deal is monopoly, and nothing else. If men buy up all the oranges, and let them decay by the bushel, rather than sell them under the exorbitant price they have established for their own emolument, they are monopolists, and enemies of fair trade; and if workmen combine together to prevent people from obtaining shoes, or cloth, or houses, or railroads at any price except the one they agree to establish, they act in the very same spirit of monopoly of which they so justly complain in capitalists. In the one case, oranges which are needed are left to rot; and in the other case, laborers who are needed are left to starve, unless supported in idleness by those who hinder them from working. The spirit of the thing is bad and the principle of it is wrong, whatever form it may take. The attempt to prevent men who want to work from working in any part of the world where labor is needed seems to me contemptible in spirit and shallow in policy. It seems to me that justice, kindness, and enlightened self-interest all require us to welcome John Chinaman to our shores. He is a patient, steady, industrious brother of the human family. There is not room enough for him at home, and we have more room than we need. We can do good to him, and he can do good to us. As for his degrading the position of workmen because he can live on a rat a day, and charge for his labor accordingly, any evil of that sort, if it existed at all, would be of very transient duration. They would soon get bravely over all that. The Irish considered themselves lucky if they could obtain a good meal of potatoes every day in their native land; but they had not been in this country long before roasted turkey and plum-pudding took the place of potatoes, and at the present time whoever would secure their services must keep a luxurious table. Tea four times a day was the last requisition made upon me, when I employed an Irish woman to do a job at a price which would enable her to board at hotels.

A WESTERN editor accuses another of having stolen his report of a meeting, which was recognized by certain earmarks. The courteous retort is that the first editor "should tie his ears over the top of his head while writing, to keep them out of the ink-bottle."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I do not hear much said about THE INDEX, except in a general way. People say they like it, and that is a grand thing. — said that it was very badly edited. To tell the truth, I have been disappointed in the last one or two numbers. I was sorry to see that affair with the Commercial in it. The paper is too small to be filled with such purely local matter. If it was as big as the Independent, it might do, for the thing was spicy; but it is too bad to devote so much space to what can have no interest to outsiders beyond its spiciness. It seems to me that there are more important things than Unitarian matters and the action of the Toledo press to speak of in your editorial page. You cannot afford to do such things. If you want to keep people's attention, you must let all such matters alone and devote yourself to speaking your own truth in your own way, without reference to your neighbors. I don't mean that you are influenced by them, and I know it is a great temptation to say sharp things when you have the opportunity; and you certainly have plenty of chances. But I think it would be better if you let them entirely alone. I think I realize how little people care about such things."

"In THE INDEX I notice quite a good deal said about organizing and sending our names to Mr. Potter. I am not sure that is the best way. Many years ago I got out of the notion of organization, except for financial purposes; and when I got our Parlor Club started, I thought best to have no organization but attraction, and it has lived three years on that basis. Its prospects for the coming winter are brighter than ever, and we shall call our first meeting the second Saturday in October. This winter I will send you, from time to time, short notices of our doings."

"Some feel that you have been too Toledoish this summer; some expected all your essays would be new work; some wanted your say on numerous current points in short articles, instead of 'communications,' and some wanted to hear from you of books. These are as I have picked them up. I have no means of knowing whether you will lose anything on these accounts; still less whether you may not gain by extension of interest ten times as much as you lose."

"I enclose 25 cts. for which please send me a few numbers of THE INDEX. I hope by means of 'Religious Revivals' and the 'Efficacy of Prayer' to obtain a few new subscribers. I am much moved by the communication of Austin Kent, and am hoping that a friend to whom I shall send it will 'pray out of his pocket-book' in his behalf. He is a man who prays much after that fashion."

"My attention was first drawn to THE INDEX by your friend —. I liked the first copies and obtained others. My desire to see it increased, until now it has become chronic and irresistible. Though not appearing by name on your books, I am nevertheless in regular receipt of your paper."

"Excuse my adding that I was surprised and pained at your printing, without comment, your correspondent's charge that the leaders of Unitarianism were half fools, etc. I fear you will be unjustly blamed for it, though not by —."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be held for the present on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock, in LYCEUM HALL. The public are cordially invited to attend.

A Social Meeting of this Society and its friends will be held on Thursday evening, October 20, at 7½ o'clock, at the residence of Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 19 Seventeenth St. A full attendance is desired.

At the Social Meeting held last Friday evening, at Mrs. CURTIS's, the following gentlemen were appointed as a LOCAL COMMITTEE to make arrangements for the approaching Convention of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION:—MR. H. E. HOWE, MR. S. D. CURTIS, MR. A. E. MACOMBER.

DONATIONS.—The INDEX ASSOCIATION make grateful acknowledgement of the following donations recently received:—

Poetry.

THE TWO EMBODIMENTS.

PART I.—THE DEVIL AS EPICURUS.

Ambition is an empty thing :
It is not worth
The costly bartering
Of mirth,
That is the price of it.

A false, deceitful thing is love,
Whose little worth
The fool may count above
Sweet mirth ;
But wise men scoff at it.

Some think religion is a prize
Of greatest worth ;
'T is bought at sacrifice
Of mirth,—
Therefore I'll naught of it.

A fig for glory, love, and prayer !
They are not worth
The tithing of a hair ;
But mirth—
I'd give them all for it !

PART II.—THE DEVIL AS JOHN CALVIN.

What joy it is to see Servetus burn—
To hear the crackling fire around him hiss,
To mark his shrinking flesh to cinder turn,
To know his agony as frightful is
As will be his eternal pangs in Hell !
When I do think what his offence hath been,
I know, O Lord, I have done passing well
To cause that those hot faggots should be green,
Since, burning slow, they'll give him time to groan,
Yet not afford him leisure to atone !

Why screams he not ? Why yells he not for pain ?
Will he not cheer me with a single moan ?
The stubborn wretch in death yet once again
Would rob me of my dues ! O, may he groan
A million years in Hell in recompense !
Ha, now the licking flames his eye-ball sears,
And, joy of joys, his screams find utterance !
Would I dared cry—"SERVETUS, CALVIN HEARS !"
But no—men might not see this joy of mine
Is but obedience to the laws divine.

O kind and loving Father ! God of Heaven !
Who makest glad the hearts of Thine elect
By giving them what Thou to me hast given—
To see the tortures that Thou thus inflict
On those predestined to eternal woe !
I thank Thee that these eyes of mine have seen
The bitter sufferings of my haughty foe ;
I pray Thee that, even as his pangs have been,
Thy mercy grant thee thus may ever be—
That he may burn through all eternity !

The Index.

OCTOBER 22, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION ; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

CHURCH-GOING.

Occasionally, heretic as we are, we drop into an Evangelical church and patiently sit through the services, as not a few other heretics do occasionally and sometimes—regularly. Again and again we have seen some ordained Dryasdust get up, read hymns (sometimes beautiful hymns) as he would an invoice of hardware, make prayers which are simply a series of instructions to God how to conduct the universe in the special interest of the congregated church-members, or else a string of special favors to which their "faith in the gospel" gives them a sort of right (because, in the phrase we have often heard, the speaker "takes the Lord at his word," i. e. holds him to his Bible promises and refuses on any condition to let him off), and deliver a sermon which is a rehash for the thousandth time of doctrines as familiar to the audience as their A B C, and as nutritive as the "sawdust pudding" which Benjamin Franklin or some other old worthy used to recommend as a substitute for unattainable dinners. We have seen these performances gone through without a particle of apparent feeling, in a manner utterly hard, cold, prosaic, stiff, and dead,—all the more repulsive because the phrases used, the lifeless residuum of once fervid emotion, had become like sea-shells cast up on the beach, their living inhabitants now sun-dried and baked, and redolent only of arrested putrefaction. Yet the house would be full, and the listeners all decorously still, guiltless of any show of disgust, though evidently unimpressed.

Even when the minister saved us from this absolute ennui by some symptoms of earnestness, or (rarely) by the tone of intense conviction, there has been the same everlasting ringing of changes on a few old dogmas as juiceless as they are false. "Flat, stale, and unprofitable,"—that was the mildest verdict we could pass. And when we saw the people streaming out of the church-doors, a few chatting unconcernedly in harmless or harmful gossip, the majority stiffly bearing themselves with a certain Sunday solemnity of face and gait, we could but wonder at the tenacity of the popular religious system, and ask what it was that thus perpetuated it like a mastodon's skeleton in the midst of this busy American life.

For it cannot be supposed by any one aware of the living thought of to-day that Orthodoxy has any strong hold on the minds of the majority even of church-goers, especially of the men among them. The earnest Orthodox are mainly Beecherites, who have really cut loose from the dogmas on which the whole Orthodox system rests. The majority let the match and the gunpowder lie side by side in their minds, safely because undisturbed. The ideas of the Sunday and the ideas of the week are as yes and no. THE STRENGTH OF ORTHODOXY TO-DAY IS THE PEOPLE'S THOUGHTLESSNESS. Once get the public mind to working freely on the question of religion, and the beginning of the end is come. Once let it act on Christianity as it now acts on business and politics, and its chains will snap like Samson's seven green withs in the legend.

The people go to church less from conviction than from sheer force of habit. They passively listen ; they do not actively believe. The power of association, the contagion of fashion, the blind conservatism of mere feeling, the love of respectability, the shrewd calculations of policy, which foots up the cash value of hypocritical conformity,—these do a thousandfold more to fill the churches than belief in the Evangelical "scheme of redemption." Multitudes attend church regularly, pay largely, hold the highest position in Evangelical societies, who are known, even by their ministers, to have no more faith in "salvation by the blood of Christ" than in the tales of the Arabian Nights. Instead of denouncing such men as heretics, the ministers meekly connive in their defection from "the faith," and are only too glad to accept their generous contributions to the ministerial salary. Investigation into the real sentiments of almost any congregation would be the depopulation of the church. Hardly a man, and but a portion of the women, is altogether "sound in the faith." The system of Orthodoxy is thoroughly honey-combed ; and one of these days, when the storm comes, it will topple like a house of cards. Church-going, common as is the practice, is to-day no proof of Orthodoxy ; and the ministers know it. But partly from sincere convictions, partly for less disinterested reasons, they urge it as a solemn duty to "frequent the house of God," to "improve the means of grace," etc., etc. Provided you come regularly, and pay for the privilege of coming with equal regularity, you will be reckoned as a "pillar of the church," and no awkward inquiries will be pushed into the secrets of your thought. If there were no other interests enlisted in support of the churches than earnest zeal for Christian doctrines, we should soon see a collapse that would amaze the nations ; but remembering the vast capital invested, and the powerful conservative instincts engaged, we see that the churches will not speedily disappear. Their "hour has not yet come."

The real religion of our times is not inside church walls. We see it in Sanitary Commissions and Aid Societies for the victims of war, in all the humanitarian movements which are the glory of the age, in the new leaven of liberty which is working in Europe and all over the world with such terrible threatening to Cæsarisms, kingdoms and Papacies, in the growing consciousness of the duties which we all owe each other as brothers and sisters in one great family of Man. Here we behold the real worship which knows no taint of superstition. Call it what you please—the directing providence of God outside of Nature, the self evolving energies of matter in a Godless universe, or the stirrings of a divine, omnipresent Power working in Nature and her highest product, the soul of man,—this new religion is the spirit of a deep, tender, and most earnest HUMANITY, penetrating through dead forms to the living truth, hating hypocrisies and cleaving to realities, trampling on all thraldoms in passionate devotion to freedom, smiting down the giant tyrannies of the past, kneeling, sword in hand, on the field of blood, and turning upward to the skies a face bathed in the holy light of a glorious dawning day. Though sweaty and begrimed with the stains of immemorial slavery, we behold this stalwart form of Humanity arising from the mire of its degradation, clothed with strength and majesty as with a garment, and in the magnificent promise of its future we forget its nakedness and its blindness and the broken fetters still clinging to its limbs. The battle is not yet over. Heaven is still hidden by the dust and smoke of the fray. Though he gripes the serpents of superstition and ignorance by the neck in deadly grasp, the young Hercules is even yet a babe, nor knows his own Olympian destinies. But after wanderings and toils not laid upon the weak, the gods shall yet recognize their own, and the great drama of history with its unutterable pathos of blood and tears shall be no tragedy at the last. The dynasties of princes and pontiffs are as a tale that is told; and Humanity, bearded and crowned, shall yet reign upon heights divine.

The Present Age, a weekly Spiritualist paper second to none (so far as we know) published by the Spiritualists, has been removed from Kalamazoo, Mich., to Chicago, Ill., increased in size, and even improved in quality. Its tone is dignified and liberal, and in uncompromising advocacy of true reform it allows none of its contemporaries to outstrip it. The number before us (Sept. 24) has very excellent articles, among which we will mention "The Proposed New Bible," "Henry C. Wright," and particularly "Sensationalism," by Mr. J. S. Loveland. The Editor is Col. Dorus M. Fox, who is supported by a numerous corps of collaborators. Price, $3.00 a year; address the Editor, 106 Randolph St., Chicago.

COME!

- "Rarely glorious is this sunshine,
Mellowing with its generous rays
Air that is pure as the purest wine,
Filling brim-full these autumn days."
- "Rarely blue is the arching sky,
Rarely blue is the restless lake:
Dear-heart, come! Put labor by—Leave care behind for the sweet day's sake."
- "Come taste this vintage which is o'erflowing,
Free for the earth and us to quaff;
Thy pulse and cheek it will set a-glowing,
May-hap, worn heart, it will tempt a laugh."
- "Behind us we'll leave the noisy town,
Out from its dust and dirt we'll go,
Out to the road-side, quiet and brown;
Then, tired feet, you may travel slow."
- "Slowly we'll go through the meadows wide,
Where the alder leaves are turning red,
And slowly down to the river's side,
That's singing lullabies in its bed."
- "Here on the bank, still green, we'll rest;
Over our heads, the leaves are gay,
And talk to each other, methinks, in jest;
I will not hear one sigh to-day!"
- "The year moves on to the sweetest rhyme,
It is not sad at growing old;
To the music, O friend, are you keeping time?
Age need not make the blood run cold."
- "Why, child, it is not so long ago, Since life for me meant music rare."
- "There! Dear-heart, didn't I tell you so?
Youth's elixir is in this air."
- "Now you are rested, I know: and so
We will be up, up and away;
For I must gather, ere home we go,
Of woodland flowers a rare bouquet."
- "These golden-rods, with their feathery spray,
I'll put by the purple aster's side;
Then, massed with autumn leaves so gay,
Look—what posy more worth your pride?"
- "A whole arm-full of gorgeous beauty,
To bear along our homeward way;
A bit of new strength for to-morrow's duty,
Trophies enough of one perfect day."
- "The wine was good"—I hear her saying,
"It made me glad, it makes me strong,"
Gladness and strength are her ways of praying—
To the Good Giver both belong.
- And all through the grinding toil of to-morrow
Her face will glow with a holy light;
Work is a benison laid upon sorrow
By hands of infinite love and might,—
- Hands that as well give holiday cheer;
Hark to his voice this autumn day!
Come, drink this wine of the ripening year;
Dear, sad, tired hearts, come all away!

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN AND HIS WIFE,

Having seen it stated in some religious papers, that Keshub Chunder Sen is opposed to the elevation of the women of his country, I give you an account of an interview he had with Miss ——— in relation to the education of his own wife. Miss ——— had been sent to ——— by the "Woman's Union of Foreign Missions," an association which sends out single women for the purpose of educating the women of India; and had already been admitted to several families of the highest rank, when Mr. Sen sent to know if she would teach his wife. Feeling that she had as much to do as she could well attend to, she called upon him to say that she had not the time at her disposal. But he entreated her so earnestly that, at last, she consented. Mr. Sen then led her to his wife's room, and introduced her to his wife and mother. Miss ——— went several times to the house, but it was either a feast day or a holy day, or Mrs. Sen had gone to see her relations, so that she could never see her; and she gave up trying. Mr. Sen then sent, asking her to try again. She went, but with no better success. Several times this happened; and then she sent word that she had not time. Mr. Sen then went himself to see her, and begged her to make one more trial. She told him it would be of no use; she could never see his wife, and that she could not afford to take the time for it. He still entreated, till at last, forgetting herself, she said:—"Why, Babu, I am astonished! I expected to find your wife different from the other women. I thought your influence over her would be so great that she would be more intelligent and have a greater desire to learn." He exclaimed in intense excitement:—"You know it isn't my fault! You know I can't help it! You know I have no influence, no control over my own wife. I can't ask her to do the least thing without first asking permission of my mother." And his mother is bitterly opposed to his wife's being educated in any but the old way.

[We have reason to believe that the above testimony is strictly correct, though we are not authorized to give any names.—Ed.]

TRUE FREEDOM.

"The truth shall make you free."

Paul declares himself a Pharisee of the straightest sect. Those who are familiar with the demands of the pharisaical creed upon its disciples can readily understand the enthusiasm of this earnest man for the religion of Jesus. On becoming a Christian, he emerged from the slavish ritualism of the Jewish church, and placed his neck under the yoke of the meek and lowly Nazarene; and the contrast was so great, he imagined he had reached a state of perfect freedom. This was a natural result, and Paul only showed himself a type of mankind in general, who always judge by comparison.

Absolute freedom being still an ideal goal to which none has attained, it is not wonderful that those who have groaned under the galling chains of some most crushing form of despotism, which, like a frightful nightmare, has ever weighed down their powers and paralyzed their energies, should rejoice and be exceedingly glad when released from such a state, and placed under the government of a kindly-hearted king, whose iron rule is softened by love for his subjects. They now look back upon their former condition with horror, and rejoice greatly at the change which has done so much for them. Christianity in its purity is a great improvement on Judaism. The yoke of Jesus is much lighter than that of the priesthood; and the enthusiastic and logical Paul was dazzled with the grandeur of a scheme of salvation which had for its corner-stone a benevolence so sublime as that manifested by Jesus of Nazareth in dying for truth and humanity. Such examples are exceedingly rare in history, much more so than now; and it would have been strange indeed if the hearts of good and true men had not been taken captive, and made to rejoice in what they conceived to be the freedom of a glorious truth. When Martin Luther broke the chains of papal infallibility that for ages had rested upon the whole Christian world, crushing out the heart and life of humanity, and won freedom from the damning influence of a few of the darkest dogmas of the Catholic Church for himself and followers, they in their enthusiasm imagined they had reached ultimate truth and perfect freedom. The world of mind, like the universe of matter, advances step by step; and in the course of time Wesley was favored with brighter glimpses of truth, and sublimer conceptions of freedom than were ever dreamed of by Luther. The benevolent Murray took a step still in advance of Wesley; and now comes our beloved Channing, whose feet touched heights more sublime than had ever been trod by mortals. Still the summit was not gained; and Parker, glorious Theodore ("gift of God"), mounting at first upon the thought of Channing, ascended still higher, and by the magnetism of his grand soul, and the magic of his earnest eloquence, lifted many up to his plane of thought. Still—

"The world rolls freedom's radiant way,
And ripens with her sorrow;
Take heart! Who bears the cross to-day,
Shall wear the crown to-morrow."

That truth is the parent of freedom is proved by all history, political as well as religious. Advanced minds in every age and country have shown themselves friends of justice, equality, freedom, and fraternity. A religion of perfect truth must therefore be a religion of perfect freedom. This neither Judaism, Mohammedanism, nor Christianity can claim to be. Catholics make no such claim. On the contrary, they hold that the authority of the church over the soul is absolute; the whole duty of the disciple is to submit to every ordinance without question, to believe every dogma without mental reservation, and make every sacrifice demanded without complaining. The Evangelical Protestant churches demand little less. Indeed, where they possess the power, they invariably show themselves as despotic as the mother church. Witness the "Blue Laws" of Puritan Connecticut, under which men and women were fined and imprisoned for not attending church, or for taking a walk on Sunday, or for saying that the Bible was not an infallible book, &c., &c. These laws were the work of the church, and made for her protection; no man could hold office or even vote in those days, who did not enjoy the confidence of the church. Christianity emitted a phosphorescent light during the dark ages, just as the glow-worm and ignis fatuus light up the Dismal Swamp at midnight; but it pales before the light of freedom developed in these later days. The Unitarians (Liberal Christians?) assert that true Christianity is compatible with freedom, and repel the charge as a slander that either Catholicism or Evangelical Protestantism represents Christianity correctly. Unitarians are the true Christians. A more absurd pretension or a more presumptuous claim has not been made by any set of men during the past century. Unitarianism is in its doctrines a protest against every fundamental doctrine of Christianity as taught by Paul and Peter, the founders of the church. Moreover, it is in direct antagonism to the chief dogmas taught by Jesus, whom they attempt to make responsible for Christianity.

A few examples will illustrate this point. Jesus, accepting the dogma of original sin, says,—"Unless a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." Unitarians say that the story of the "fall" is a mythical legend, and men need no new hearts, but the development and proper training of their natural powers. Jesus says—"He that believeth not the gospel as Peter and Paul shall preach it, shall be damned." Unitarians say it matters not what a man's belief may be, if his actions are right. This I heard a leading Unitarian clergyman say in a sermon to-day. Jesus says—"He that works one hour shall receive the same pay as he that toils the whole day." (See parable of the vineyard.) Unitarians teach that the law of compensation is universal and immutable, and men are always rewarded according to their deeds.

These examples might be multiplied almost indefinitely; but those presented are sufficient to show the absurdity of the claim of our Unitarian friends to the title of Christians. "Liberal" Christians they style themselves. While definitions remain authoritative, the term "Liberal Christianity" will be a misnomer. It ranks with such phrases as conservative radicalism, or democratic monarchy. Most Unitarians are free from the absurd dogmas of Christianity, but, being slaves to public opinion, they toady to it on account of its prestige, or cling to its skirts through a perverted and morbid veneration, or an unmanly pusillanimity.

"The truth shall make you free," and the truth, followed to its ultimate result, will land you safely upon the platform of Free Religion.

T. A. BLAND.

REFLECTIONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 7, 1870.

DEAR SIR:—I read your thoughtful paper with great interest. I rejoice with you in the increase of thinking people, and believe that, while conservatism may retard, it cannot prevent the development of religious knowledge.

For how simple is Religion! how complex, Opinion! Few individuals understand the one, and many trouble themselves about the other. Of Religion no one can doubt, because it is one of the innate feelings. But of Opinion there is as wide a difference as of climates, countries, and sentient creatures brought into existence by the Creative Spirit.

Who is religious? what is Religion? When shall we begin to define it so that men shall discriminate between it and mere opinions about forms and creeds? The agents of evil in the world—called the "faithful"—are mostly selfish or crazed supporters of opinions; while the agents of good—called the "infidel"—are the really religious everywhere. Perhaps if the worshippers of Opinion had not a pocket interest in their sacred, self-saving selfishness, they would be less belligerent, and would recognize the divine spirit of Religion in toleration and universal liberty. Living idly—that is, irreligiously—upon the labor of others, is it not wonderful that priests have imposed upon men opinions and forms which have nothing really to do with Religion?

But what is Religion? Is it not, in common language, the fact of being good and doing good? Keeping a mind ever tolerant and open to the reception of truths as soon as revealed by study, experiment, and research into the laws which govern the moral and material worlds? And what are creeds, forms, beliefs, faiths, but opinions forced upon men against their will?

As these revelations are made, they weaken mere Opinion. They develop knowledge of the laws of mind, necessarily unknown to the savage; and proclaim the laws of matter, whereby the general wealth is increased. For we must bear in mind that there is no civilization without material progress, and no material progress without religion or the activity of the highest sentiments. True progress is work, and he who works best is the truest pray-er, and his prayers are ever answered.

By the progress of the intellect we begin to be able to calculate what social changes should be, and prophesy what they must be. We comprehend what we gain in actual wealth of more equal and fraternal conditions. We see what enormous disadvantages and losses spring from the antagonistic spirit, and learn to apply moral methods to our labor system, so that we may attain to that harmonious inequality of condition in which no man need want, and no man have more than he can possibly manage.

Opinionists have an instinctive dread of Religion, and everywhere are inclined to persecute. Religionists with equal instinct love the law, and are inclined to charity, justice and liberty.

Of what use, indeed, is it to a man if he gain the whole world to his Opinion, and yet lose his soul by neglecting Religion? If the future world is a spiritual condition, man need be careful of his thoughts and beliefs. For the believer in Hell will in all probability experience this place or condition of his own mental creation. It is not the man condemned, but he who damns to gratify his hatred, that must bear the pains.

Faith is the belief in the known. Knowing, we necessarily believe, and our faith is perfect. But of what avail is a belief in Hell, of which a man can know nothing? Of what avail to believe in saints of whom we have no positive knowledge, or in revelations not of our own mind, but of others? How natural, nevertheless, that distressed nations, like the Jews, should have mentally hoped for a Messiah or Savior—looking, like Micawber, for “something to turn up”—to revenge them of their enemies! These imaginations are not Religion; they are only Opinion at best. And what is worst, Opinion forced upon men in times when their thoughts were imperfect and their actions brutal.

Our revolutionary movements are but efforts “to be better and do better.” All restrictions, usurpations and tyrannies are selfish desires to gain the objects of Opinion—all efforts to escape from them, the effort of Religious sentiments to govern the passions and establish the divine rule.

It appears to me that reformers should protest against the misuse of the word “Religion.” An opinion or superstition, derived from others, should never be designated “Religion,” which is the divine or moral action of the individual mind.

We are only on the way to a higher civilization. In the savage state men have to fight for very existence. Ours is a transitional period. Antagonism still is active, but uses intellect in imperfect moral light. The Religion of every-day life and work is beyond most men's comprehension. The great controller of the mind—conscientiousness—is among the least active of the moral sentiments, and hence neither in conduct nor in faith do men approach nearer Religion than by the hypocritical imitation of it for temporal advantages.

Yours very fraternally,
CHAS. L. ALEXANDER.

THE PRESENT AND THE FUTURE.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1870.

MR. ABBOT,—I deem it of far more practical importance to know whether we are, in a true sense, living now and here, than to know whether, in a vulgar sense, death will end our being. Conscious guilt seeks salvation, as conscious death gasps and struggles for life. Death ends life, but not subsequent re-creation; and this is neither salvation nor immortality, but like all other creation. All knowledge gives all power; under its direction unintelligent force and matter waltz, hand in hand, through the vast halls of being, and after millions of years are as fresh as ever. Now if Deity thus carefully endows these, the mere shoddy of the universe, with endless existence, will he impeach and stultify himself by a total disregard for the intelligent spirit? Will he preserve, with such absolute exactness, all but the truly great in the scale of intrinsic value,—thus keep the atom and not a Jesus, Howard or Newton,—thus save the raw material of honey, and not care for the little hive of life's elaborated sweets? Believing that the known conducts to the unknown, let us apply the principle to this case. We know that nothing dies a natural death until it has fulfilled the legitimate purpose of its life. Will the human soul prove an exception? The biennial plant lives on another year; and whether the little I AM be an annual, biennial, or perennial, I say—“Thy will be done!”—and go cheerfully forth to the work of this present life, believing I thus tread the true pathway to the next. And as the acorn foretells the future unfolding and life and beauty of the oak, so likewise does the soul foretell with equal clearness its own endless life, growth and perfection.

Sincerely your friend, W. T.

“A CRITICISM OF OUR AIM.”

[From the Chicago Examiner for November, Mr. Towne's new monthly.]

One of our truest radicals, an admirably Christian scholar, thinker, and man, writes to us of our position as follows:—

“I do not assent to the fundamental proposition which you intend the Examiner shall support, that Free Religion is Christianity stripped of unessential opinion and tradition. I don't care to keep the Christian name—would rather have it dropped, and expect it some day to be dropped. Of course I understand your meaning, that what has given to Christianity its best vitality and power is its free and universal elements, the great spiritual realities found under all forms of religion. And to this I assent. But I see no logic in calling these universal elements by the specific name ‘Christian.’ Why go to the progressive Jew, or Hindu, or the Confucian, and say, ‘The essential, vital truth under your religious belief is to be called Christianity?’ I am content to find that it is the same with the essential and permanent in the Christian religion, and will not insist that he shall call it ‘Christianity,’ any more than I would yield to his claim that I should call my religion ‘Judaism’ or ‘Hinduism.’ Why not take at once the large term that includes them all—universal Religion?”

Our friend very seriously misapprehends our position, which is, that we, and all others, Jews, Mahometans, Hindus, and whoever has a religion which at heart is religion, should, by radical reform, strip off what is not true religion, and make, each for his people, a true Judaism, or true Christianity, or true Hinduism, or true Mahometanism. We could easily show our friend that Jews, Arabs, Persians, Hindus, Siamese Buddhists, and other representatives of world-religions, as well as Christians, are each freeing their respective faiths of superstition, and are appealing to their fellow-believers to use each their traditional religious name as properly meaning the pure truth freed from the husk of error. We, on radical Christian ground, say to each of these faiths, hold your ground and keep your name, and let us have a world-fellowship of the different religions of the earth. Our idea, when we asked our friend to join us in a resolution to secure a new organization for religious ends, and the idea we supposed the Free Religious Association was to represent, was this unity of religions with liberty and diversity both of names and special tenets. We wanted to see all classes of Christians come together, Catholic, Calvinist, etc., etc., on a platform of generous human recognition of one another, and with them, if occasion should be found, men and women of other names than the Christian. We desired to see each accept the method of radical reform, each putting his truest truth in front, and agreeing to hold together by that, and to hold separately other things as each felt necessary.

Our Free Religion leaves the Catholic a Catholic, and the Hindu a Hindu, and the Moslem a Moslem, and the Jew a Jew, and the Christian a Christian, each to wear his providential name, and to have his individual peculiarities of creed and worship, until we all come in the unity of faith unto a PERFECT MAN. But our friend, if he is logically consistent, as he seems to mean to be, must ask each of these to drop their providential name and take that of Free Religionist, or universal Religionist. If, to use Mr. Abbot's language, he proposes to “stand squarely outside of Christianity,” he must also stand squarely outside of the other great religions, or else go squarely into some one of them. Assuming that he has not found any of these religions “a good place to emigrate to,” and that he sees the logic of his position, he really helps to set up, as far as his nominal relations are concerned, a very small new sect, in fact making Free Religion a Boston and Toledo notion, and doing this none the less although those engaged in it feel as broad and liberal as all out-of-doors. Our friend, in short, squares off against all the religions of the world, nominally, while we accept our Christian name and place with all the other world-religions. He and we alike hold and work for the truth of pure FREE RELIGION, and sympathize with it wherever found, but he declines, or would prefer to drop out of, nominal relation to Christians, while we adhere to that relation, and do it on a principle which warrants the Jew, the Hindu, the Moslem, and other religionists of the world in keeping each to his own name and fellowship as God has made them to dwell on all the face of the earth.

This principle is really radical and free, it makes the name a name only, and gives freedom of names and peculiarities. Our friend's principle is neither radical nor free, for it does not allow perfect liberty as to names, and it insists, not merely on the root of pure truth, but on a correct name, thus creating a kind of Free Religious orthodoxy which is all about a name. Especially if this is carried to the extreme point made by Mr. Abbot, that none are truly and honestly Christian who do not take Jesus as Messiah, it gives Free Religion an attitude not merely of strictness, but of bigotry. We have a perfect right to judge for ourselves how to be honest Christians, and our friend misses the radical mark exceedingly when he makes the ado he does about other people's honesty. It is done with a nobly pure purpose, but it ought to be left undone nevertheless. We consider it our duty to stay under the Christian name, and make Christianity mean Free Religion.

We do in this matter as Theodore Parker did in the matter of American politics. He took his part as an American citizen, and worked to make “American” mean justice to all men. Mr. Phillips was working for the same thing, but refused all citizen relations on the ground that “American” did not mean justice. He was for breaking up the national fellowship, while Mr. Parker was for purging it. Our friend and Mr. Abbot take just the ground about Christianity which Mr. Phillips took about the Constitution and the Union. It turned out that Mr. Parker was the true prophet. The course of events purged the nation and left it united. Does anybody wish Mr. Phillips could have had his way, to break the country in two, one part to be free, and the other to be securely slave, with no abolition fellow-citizens to molest or make them afraid? We are for purging Christianity, not seceding from it. Even communicated, we claim and will hold our place. And it is as sure as fate that Christianity will be purged as our nation was purged, and made to mean FREE RELIGION. The other religions also will be purged in like manner. Whether some of the great names will fall we neither know nor care. Possibly they may. But if they do not, and probably they will not, we can still have religion free and pure in all the great divisions of the race.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE CONVENTIONS.

Public Conventions under the auspices of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are to be held this Autumn as follows:

At CINCINNATI, Tuesday evening, November 1st, and Wednesday, November 2d, through the day.

At INDIANAPOLIS, Thursday evening, November 3d, and Friday, November 4th, through the day.

At TOLEDO, Monday evening, November 7th, and through the day, November 8th.

Local Committees will give due notice of the place and hours for meeting in their respective towns.

The friends of reason and freedom in religion, the seekers after truth, all those who would have religion applied directly to questions of social reform and practical life, the foes of sectarianism, of superstition, of dogmatism, in the cities where the meetings are to be held and from all the country around, are urged to attend these Conventions. Let there be a grand rally. Those, too, who are not in sympathy with the Free Religious Association are cordially invited to attend.

Practical subjects, bearing on the vital issues of the day, will be discussed, such as “Radical Organization,” “The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,” “Bible Worship,” “The Sunday Question,” “The Relation of Religion to the State in America.”

Able speakers will be present, prepared to address the Conventions on these subjects. Time will be allowed also for free discussion.

Among the speakers positively expected to attend all the Conventions are O. B. Frothingham, President of the Association, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, Francis E. Abbot, Thomas Vickers, Miss Lillie Peckham, and Wm. J. Potter. It is also hoped that Col. T. W. Higginson, Rabbi Max Lilienthal, Rowland Connor, and Edward C. Towne will be present. Others have been invited.

Any newspapers interested that will make an item of this notice will confer a favor.

In addition to the above notice we can report this week that arrangements for the Conventions are proceeding very satisfactorily. The opening session of the Cincinnati Convention, Tuesday evening, Nov. 1st, is to be held in the fine Hebrew Temple, over which Dr. Wise is the presiding Rabbi. At this session it is expected that Hon. George Hoadly, of Cincinnati, will preside and make an introductory address. He will be followed by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, President of the Association, (who will set forth the general principles and aims of the free religious movement), and probably by Col. T. W. Higginson. The sessions of the following day—morning, afternoon, and evening—will be held in the main hall of the new Free Church, where Rev. Mr. Vickers preaches. Each of these sessions will be devoted to a special topic, to be presented in an introductory address by some chosen speaker, and then opened to general discussion. There will be a good number of well known speakers in attendance, and no lack, we are sure, of wise and earnest talk. It is to be reckoned a good omen that the Convention is to have its meetings in a Jewish Synagogue, and in a Radical Congregational Church. This fact of itself speaks of the spiritual freedom, progress and fellowship which the Association represents. So may all sectarian barriers, modern and ancient, vanish before the advancing truth! The liberal Jewish Rabbis, Wise and Lilienthal, are working heartily for the Convention, and their voices will be heard in the meetings. Dr. Wise means to attend all the Conventions. At Indianapolis and Toledo the programme in general will be the same as at Cincinnati, with some variations as to subjects and speakers. Friends of the Conventions in all these cities are warmly interested, and will do their part to make the meetings a success.

LIBERAL JUDAISM.

It is evident that liberal Judaism exists in other places besides Cincinnati. It seems to be having a rapid progress in this country. Among other recent evidences we have noted the following account of the consecration of a new synagogue in Rochester, N. Y. A correspondent of the Liberal Christian, "N. M. M." sympathetically describes the occasion thus:—

We were invited to attend the consecration of the new synagogue of the congregation of Elon Yerak in the city of Rochester, and found it a very enjoyable occasion. The capacity of the building is not large, and accordingly tickets of admission were issued to prevent uncomfortable crowding. A band of music was in attendance to give expression to the evident pride and delight of the congregation, and a large choir discoursed some very agreeable melodies. While the opening pieces were being sung, the "Holy Books," cased in their warm velvet wrappers, were brought in on the shoulders of four men, and borne several times around, up and down the aisles. These appeared to be the only idols these people have. After this parade the precious bundles of vellum were deposited in the "Ark," the Rabbi of the congregation intoning some service in the Hebrew tongue, and the veil dropped before the holy place.

The formalities of consecration thus over, Dr. Vidover, of New York, arose and preached an eloquent discourse from Numbers xxiv. 5:—"How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!" He spoke without notes, in an earnest and impassioned manner, of the service the Hebrew nation has rendered to the religion of the modern world; of the ancient origin of its faith; claiming for it that it was the first enlightened expression of the religious sentiment. He urged especially that Moses instituted the earliest popular form of worship; that whatever prior and contemporaneous religions of the olden time at best may have been, they were for the priesthood rather than for the people; that, though the multitudes had their domestic deities, they nothing of worship in public assemblies. Moses popularized religion. After illustrating this view with many learned and beautiful testimonies he proceeded to speak of worship in its two-fold character of devotion and instruction, a service of the heart and of the mind, a proper feeling of gratitude and love toward God, and a right moral preparation for the discharge of our duties toward each other. The speaker took occasion to express the broadest views, and seemed to overlook entirely the distinction between Jew and Gentile; claiming little more for Judaism than all must acknowledge, and not failing to recognize truth and goodness as of one value, whether found in church, mosque or synagogue.

Such is a meagre outline of a most excellent discourse, which could hardly fail to do every one good that listened to it. There was a sense with some of us that the Rabbi had got hold of the universal faith, and that his utterances for the most part could not fail of a universal response. In prayer and sermon he spoke for us all, without the slightest taint of exclusiveness or bigotry. "Where there is purity," said he, "there is God's true temple; where duty is done, there God is acceptably served."

If this is the style of talk with Jewish teachers, may their synagogues multiply all over the earth!

The Unitarians of Rochester are seeking to further similar ideas of religion under the Christian name. But, notwithstanding the appeal of such views to the universal reason, the populace has not yet come over to our standard. But they must come at last, and it would not be well for them to come before their time. Nor is it of the utmost importance that they come to us, if only they come to Liberal ideas. So, while we rejoice in a steadily growing congregation, we rejoice still more in the advanced teaching of other pulpits, and of newspapers not technically our own. When, as of late we have found to our delight, one can hear Liberal preaching in great Orthodox churches, and can find his most cherished views advocated in the Independent, and in the columns of our secular journals as well, one knows that the ball is rolling, and may well dispense with the self-complacent feeling that it rolls because he pushes it.

ERRATUM.—In the article on "Radical Free Churches," signed "T. W. H." in THE INDEX, No. 41, for oration read oratory in the third paragraph.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. F. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others.

The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ELOQUENCE OF WENDELL PHILLIPS.—Some years ago—it was before the rebellion—when Wendell Phillips and others were using every effort to abolish slavery, there was a meeting in this city, at which he made an address. A southern slaveholder was present, and after listening a while to the burning words of the orator, went out in a rage, and resorting to the counting-room of a friend, exclaimed, "I have been to hear Wendell Phillips speak, and such words, such abuse! too bad, too bad! The rascal deserves to be hung, and if we had him at the south, hung he would be, and that right quickly too! Oh, it is too bad, too bad." "How long did you hear him speak?" asked the friend. "Why, for more than one full hour," replied the Southerner, "and all the time he poured out the hardest of words towards us of the South." "But why," inquired the friend, "why did you sit there so long, and hear such severe words?" "Because," answered the slaveholder, "confound the fellow, I couldn't get away from him." —Boston Traveller.

"I suppose," said a quack, while feeling the pulse of a patient, who reluctantly submitted to solicit his advice, "I suppose you think me a bit of a humbug?" "Sir," gravely replied the sick man, "I was not aware until now that you could so readily discover a man's thought by feeling his pulse."

MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS
Important Improvements.

Patented June 21, and August 23, 1870.
REDUCTION OF PRICES.

THE MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO. have the pleasure of announcing IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS in their Cabinet Organs, for which patents were granted them in June and August last. These are not merely meretricious attachments, but enhance the substantial excellence of the instruments. They are also enabled, by increased facilities for manufacture, to make, from this date, a FURTHER REDUCTION OF PRICES on several leading styles. Having completed and added to their former facilities a LARGE NEW MANUFACTORY, they hope hereafter to supply all orders promptly. The Cabinet Organs made by this Company are of such universal reputation, not only throughout America, but also in Europe, that few will need assurance of their superiority. For years the Company have been unable to supply the constantly increasing demand for their instruments, being always largely behind orders, though producing about twice the amount of work of any other maker of instruments of the class. This extraordinary demand is evidence that they have been successful in carrying into effect two rules which it is their purpose to adhere to rigidly, so that they may be said to be principles of their business. These are:

1. To make the very best work, and only the best; availing themselves of the best results of inventive genius, every improvement, wherever effected, and every facility which highest skill, ample experience, and liberal use of abundant means can command.

2. To sell always at the lowest possible prices, reserving to themselves the least remunerative. As cost of production is diminished, prices are reduced, and they always print their lowest prices, which are therefore subject to no discount. The extent of their business and the enormous number of Cabinet Organs which they now have occasion to produce, enables them to employ various machinery, and a division of labor which would not be possible in a smaller business. They are thus enabled to make the present reduction in prices, and to sell their work at even less than the prices commonly demanded for inferior instruments, and less than the cost of production without such extraordinary facilities.

They now offer FOUR-OCTAVE CABINET ORGANS, in quite plain cases, but equal according to their capacity to anything they make, for $50 each. THE SAME, DOUBLE REED, $65. FIVE-OCTAVE DOUBLE REED ORGANS, FIVE STOPS, with Knee-swell and Tremulant, in elegant case, with several of the Mason & Hamlin improvements, $125. The same, extra, with new Vox Humana, Automatic Swell, &c., $160. THE SAME RESONANT CASE, with new improvements, $200. FIVE OCTAVES, THREE SETTS REEDS, SEVEN STOPS with EUPHONIE, a splendid instrument, $325. TWO MANUAL CABINET ORGANS, FOUR FULL SETTS OF REEDS, NINE STOPS, $375. THE SAME, RESONANT CASE, with the new improvements, the finest instrument of the class made, $425, &c. Many other styles in proportion. A NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, with full information, and reduced prices, is now ready, and will be sent free, with TESTIMONIAL CIRCULAR, presenting a great mass of evidence as to the superiority of these instruments, to any one sending his address to the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO., 154 Tremont Street, Boston, or 596 Broadway, New York.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

"REPENTANCE" AND "FORGIVENESS."

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, in Lyceum Hall, Sunday evening, Oct. 16, 1870.]

"The substance of the gospel is, not without reason, said to be comprised in 'repentance and remission of sins.' . . . Both are conferred on us by Christ, and we obtain both by faith. . . . It ought not to be doubted that repentance not only immediately follows faith, but is produced by it. . . . Those who imagine that repentance rather precedes faith than is produced by it, as fruit by a tree, have never been acquainted with its power. . . . Evangelical repentance we discover in all who have been distressed by a sense of sin in themselves, but have been raised from their depression, and re-invigorated by a confidence in the Divine mercy, and converted to the Lord."

JOHN CALVIN, Institutes of the Christian Religion, Book III, Chap. III, Sect. 1.

I propose this evening to speak of "Repentance and Forgiveness,"—the orthodox Christian teaching on this subject, its falsity, and its demoralizing effects; and also the truth of which it is the caricature and poisonous perversion. I do so because about the middle of July I received a communication for THE INDEX [published in No. 31] from which the following is an extract:—

"I have never said much upon the subject of Religion, yet have thought sometimes that the idea Christian professors hold in regard to Repentance and Forgiveness of Sins was one great incentive to mortals to commit crime. . . . I should so love to have you, or some of your readers who write with a steady pen, write what you think of Repentance and Forgiveness. I have heard these subjects harped upon for more than fifty years, but very unsatisfactorily to my mind."

In a note appended to this communication, I promised at some time to take this as the topic of a Sunday essay; and I now improve the first convenient opportunity to redeem my promise.

The great charge brought against the moral teachings of paganism, and especially of the ancient Greek and Roman philosophers, is that they take what is called "a superficial view of sin." It is said that, while the honored teachers of antiquity laid down many high and pure moral precepts, they failed to recognize the "exceeding sinfulness of sin," and were therefore powerless to move the popular conscience or produce a deep and lasting impression on the spiritual consciousness of mankind. On the other hand, it is claimed that the Christian gospel fully recognizes this terrible fact of sin, depicts its enormity with a force and appalling truthfulness that overwhelm the guilty soul with remorse and alarm, and thus lays the axe at the very root of the Upas-tree of moral evil. There is no one point on which the preachers of evangelical Christianity insist more strenuously than this.

The reality, universality, and sure destructiveness of sin constitute the great argument by which they prove the absolute necessity to man of the Christian gospel. The world, they say, is utterly "lost and ruined," steeped in iniquity, dyed in the fastest colors of perdition. God, they say, is therefore filled with abhorrence and holy hatred for the work of his own hands, burns with dreadful wrath at the multiplied and ever-multiplying transgressions of a race wallowing in wickedness, and brandishes over their heads the thunderbolt of his destroying curse. Christ, they say, moved by pity for men thus tumbling by myriads into the pit of hell, like herds of buffaloes driven by Indians over the edge of a precipice, came down from his lofty pinnacle of exaltation, gathered into his own person the pitiless arrows of the Almighty, by his own voluntary death on the cross slaked the thirst of infinite vengeance, and thus contrived to rescue from their horrible fate the few who are willing to wash themselves in his blood. My phrases are not all quite orthodox; but that the ideas are as I state is shown by the following verse, nauseating in its hideous imagery, yet cherished as one of the most popular in all the gory hymn-books of Christendom:—

"There is a fountain filled with blood.
Drawn from Emmanuel's veins,
And sinners, plunged beneath the flood,
Lose all their guilty stains."

This being the outline of the Christian gospel as systemized by the Christian Church, the one great object of orthodox preachers is to bring men to a full consciousness, or in their own phrase to a "realizing sense," of their "lost and hopeless condition." Everything depends on convincing the people that their "sins are as scarlet," and justly expose them to the sure destruction that impends. Sin, like a frightful cancer, must be believed to have irremediably established itself in their souls, to live, as it were, by an independent life of its own, to have created a poison circulating through every artery, vein, and capillary vessel, to be sucking into itself all the nutritive juices of their being, and to be diverting these to the building up of its own horrid and parasitic organism. They must believe that they are unutterably, absolutely, and hopelessly sinful, and that sin brings condemnation to everlasting pains. The first stage, therefore, of the orthodox Christian experience is despair,—stark, blank despair; and the stereotyped description of it is that the soul is "under conviction of sin." Terror at thought of the great Judgment to come, when God shall relentlessly plunge the unrepentant into the agonies of hell, and belief that this horrible doom is a just one, because deserved even by the most trivial sin,—this is the first step in "conversion;" and it is, in substance, a mere spasm of fear, a wild panic of alarm, ending in anguish and despair.

Now repentance is simply an escape out of this "Black Hole of Calcutta." When the preacher has got his victim thoroughly paralyzed by terror and self-abhorrence, the next thing in order is to hold out a hope of salvation from the grim and ghastly fate that yawns before him. The poor creature is made to clutch at the offered hand of Jesus, who is represented as a "Savior able to save even to the uttermost." Faith in the willingness and power of Jesus to rescue him out of the very jaws of perdition is the second step of the orthodox Christian experience. The "blood of the Lamb" washes out the blackness of the sin; and the wretched sinner, plunged into the abyss of despair by the supposed infinitude of his guilt, is carried up to the seventh heaven of rapture by discovering that he emerges from the "fountain of blood" free from every stain. Until he attains this "faith" or "saving hope in Christ," he cannot repent,—cannot shake off the millstone from his neck,—cannot take the first step towards God. If he could repent without "throwing himself at the foot of the Cross," and thus by his own act escape God's withering curse, there would be no need of any Savior; and therefore Calvin, and every other clear-headed orthodox reasoner, regards repentance itself as a free gift conferred by Christ on those who believe in him. You cannot repent of yourself; you must humble your pride first, kneel at the feet of Christ, and conquer your natural repugnance to the blood-bath. Having thus proved your absolute surrender, your absolute abandonment of all attempt to save yourself, Christ graciously condescends to grant you the power of repenting, the power of "feeling a godly sorrow for your sin," without which the curse will still cling to you. The more you attempt to repent without this previous capitulation to the "Captain of your Salvation," so much the more you will fan the blazing wrath of God, and exasperate the flames of vengeance already roaring to receive you. This is the only escape from the Christian hell,—believe first, and then you will be permitted to repent. Until you believe in the "blood of Christ," you can only shriek in terror at the certainty of your damnation, and acknowledge with groans its absolute justice; but you cannot repent so as to win the pardon of God, before you fling yourself, in despair of self-salvation and faith in your appointed "Savior," at the foot of the Cross. Otherwise this "Savior" would find his office a sinecure. It is plain, therefore, that the repentance required by the Christian system is but a consequence of "faith;" its command is—"BELIEVE, OR BE DAMNED." Although it makes semi-orthodox people wince to be held to the plain logic of their own professed creed, there is no evading it. To give up the notion that the first condition of salvation is belief in the blood-bath, is to give up orthodoxy altogether.

Thus far, then, the case stands as follows. All men being desperately wicked, the sinner must first of all be overwhelmed with a sense of sin, a consciousness of his utterly depraved and lost condition, and confess that he deserves to be damned. Next, he must believe that Jesus, his "atoning sacrifice," can and will wash him clean of his iniquity, in return for faith in the "fountain filled with blood," by awakening in his soul a true sorrow or repentance for his guilt. Repentance, thus produced, secures God's forgiveness; and the man is saved from hell. This is the orthodox "plan of salvation" in a nutshell.

Now forgiveness, or remission of sins, means that God wipes out the sins themselves, and cancels absolutely their consequences. He at the same time destroys sin, the cause, and excuses from damnation, the effect. All the consequences of sin are swept away with sin itself. The sinner becomes immediately a saint, made such by his faith in the "blood of Christ." The penalties of violated law are all remitted; and though he dies three seconds afterwards, he is admitted at once to heaven. Being washed clean from all his stains, he becomes fit forthwith for the companionship of the holiest and the best. The same God who just before burned with dreadful and destroying wrath, now glows with love, and forgets to exact vengeance for the sins which have been extinguished forever in the magical pool of gore. No matter how abominable has been the life of the man, he has been changed from centre to circumference, and escapes all the Divine displeasure at his past life. Hence orthodox ministers strive their utmost to secure "death-bed repentance;" and if they can succeed in making the dying sinner confess his guilt and his faith in the atonement of blood, they confidently declare that his soul is saved, and admitted into heaven. Even murderers on the scaffold have but to adopt this easy method, in order to pass at once from the gallows to the "throne of grace," and join the throng of the blessed, with crowns on their heads and harps in their hands, to sing forever the "triumphs of redeeming love."

Some years ago I visited a Methodist camp-meeting in Massachusetts. In one of the tents I heard a loud voice in prayer, with various accompaniments of groans, amens, and hallelujahs. Looking in through the open doorway, I saw a young man on his knees praying aloud, while the perspiration ran down his face in streams. Although he seemed quite fluent, and the words poured forth in great abundance, now and then he came to an awkward pause. One of these pauses, in particular, arrested my attention. "We thank thee, O Lord," he cried, "we thank thee, O Lord, that thou didst"—He stopped, cleared his throat vigorously, and began again. "We thank thee, O Lord, that thou didst—didst—get up that scheme of redemption!"

Now the young man's blundering phrase exactly describes the orthodox "plan of salvation." It is the most thoroughly "gotten-up scheme" ever concocted by human ingenuity,—the most self-evident tissue of absurdities ever accepted by human folly. I am very far from questioning the integrity of those who devised it, or the sincerity of those who believe it. History illustrates no more remarkable trait of the human mind than the tendency which makes men carry out ideas, in the long run, to their natural and logical consequences. Plant premises in public opinion, and you may be sure that ultimately their conclusions will be thoroughly believed. It is only a question of time. Hence I look upon the whole orthodox system as the simple and honest flowering-out of certain seeds planted in the infancy of the Christian Church. But this fact does not make the system any less absurd, or any less mischievous. Its practical results only illustrate the disastrous consequences of leaving the premises of the popular thinking uncorrected by sound education. Let me briefly point out the weakness of the "scheme" I have been sketching.

In the first place, the "sense of sin" which is at the bottom of it is morbid, unnatural, and perverted. Radicals are just as keen-eyed as orthodox professors in discovering the knavery and the cruelty and the countless vices and crimes of mankind. But they see the other side of humanity, also. No man is a devil; and even in the worst of men an honest sympathy will discern much that is good. The despair engendered by the heated imaginations of orthodoxy is a moral disease of the deadliest sort, and does more to perpetuate iniquity than to cure it. It would be impossible to create this despair in any sane mind, were it not for that monstrous, abominable, diabolical fiction of an everlasting hell. For the paradoxical fact is that what the orthodox call a "sense of the exceeding sinfulness of sin," is at bottom a sense of the exceeding hotness of hell-fire. It is not an intelligent, just abhorrence of the intrinsic degradation which a man condemns himself to by violating the laws of his own moral being, but rather a cowardly dread of the pain imagined to be inflicted by the jealous and wrathful God of orthodoxy upon all who dare to disobey his unreasonable commands. Strike out this terror of being everlastingly tormented, and you will strive in vain to create the orthodox agony of despair over sin; and nobody knows this better than such men as J. D. Fulton and Earle the revivalist. Hell is the very heart of orthodoxy. Without a devil to execute damnation, there is no need of a Christ to ensure salvation. The "sense of sin," if carried beyond the natural reproaches of conscience for wilful violations of known duties, becomes utterly morbid and pernicious, and ploughs the ground for the hateful follies of orthodoxy to strike root and grow. The pain and degradation which a man feels who is obliged to despise himself, and the knowledge he has that this self-contempt puts him out of sympathy and harmony with the whole moral universe, are wholesome experiences, and prepare the way for nobler living; but the overstrained, extravagant condemnation of himself as having deserved by any amount of wrong-doing a whole eternity of vindictive torment, is a species of insanity superinduced by the insanities of orthodoxy. No healthy man ever feels in that way. Whoever feels so is the victim of disease. Of all the colossal delusions that have befooled mankind, the fear of hell is the greatest; and the orthodox "sense of sin" is its first-born child. It makes God a devil and man an idiot. Its effect on character is terrible and destructive, putting cowardice in place of courage and selfishness in place of generous self-forgetfulness. The poet Burns has fitly described it:—

"The fear o' hell's a hangman's whip,
To haud the wretch in order;
But where ye feel your honor grip,
Let that be a' your border.
Its slightest touches, instant pause,
Debar a' side pretences;
And resolutely keep its laws,
Uncaring consequences."

Furthermore, orthodox "repentance" is something most vigorously to be shunned. Its one condition being abject dependence on Christ, it demands the abjuration of that hardy self-reliance which is the creator of all sinewy and large-limbed character. There is nothing more pitiable than to see bearded men bemoaning their sins in the dust and ashes of orthodox repentance. If you have done amiss, it is manly to regret, but babyish to whine. A God that can be mollified or pleased by seeing men unman themselves, is no God for me. Whoever does a bad deed or shuns to do a good one, has truly cause to be ashamed; but no one can rectify the evil except himself. He must do his own repenting, his own reforming. Until he chooses to prove his regret for past lapses by rising superior to future temptations, he might as well sow the earth with sawdust as plead with God to take the job of reformation off his hands. If he tumbles into a pit, he will have the sympathy and help of all good people in the struggle to clamber out of it; but he has got to clamber, nevertheless. In matters of morals, nothing is ever done by proxy. This makes the inapplicability of the following illustration, used by a converted Chinese, tailor to explain the difference between Confucianism, Buddhism, and Christianity:—

"A man had fallen into a deep, dark pit, and lay in its miry bottom, groaning and utterly unable to move. Confucius walked by, approached the edge of the pit, and said—'Poor fellow, I am very sorry for you. Why were you ever such a fool as to get in there? Let me give you a piece of advice; if you get out, don't get in again.' A Buddhist priest next came by, and said—'Poor fellow, I am very much pained to see you there. I think, if you could scramble up two-thirds of the way, or even half, I could reach you and lift you up the rest.' Next the Savior came by, and, hearing the cries, went down to the very brink of the pit, stretched down and laid hold of the man, brought him up, and said—'Go, and sin no more.'"

That will do very well for pits of that kind. But if a man has fallen into a habit of lying, is the "Savior" going to come and tell the truth for him every time he is asked a question? Or has the man got to make up his mind to tell the truth himself, and take whatever consequences may come in the way of loss or disfavor? If the "Savior," in some magical way, enters the man's soul, and supplants his natural individuality, is the man a whit the better because the "Savior" tells the truth, while he himself remains dumb? The man himself is just what he was,—stays in the pit into which he fell. In these matters, every tub must stand on its own bottom. The only repentance that is worth anything, is that which consists in a vigorous resolve and a vigorous execution of it. The other is moonshine and illusion.

"Know ye not, who would be free Themselves must strike the blow?"

Lastly, the orthodox "forgiveness" is all idle dreaming. There is no salvation from hell, because there is no hell to be saved from, except the hell of self-inflicted retribution; and there is no escaping this, if the crime occurs. The criminal is his own executioner, administering the penalty in accordance with laws which he has not made and cannot alter. So long as he persists in doing evil, he is at war with himself, with the universe, with God; and every engagement is a Waterloo defeat. "Asking forgiveness" avails nothing. I must so live that I can forgive myself; and when I have forgiven myself, I know that God has forgiven me too. If I become pure in my own eyes after never so much evil living, I am forgiven in the only rational sense of the word; that is, I have come again into harmony with the laws of my own soul, which are also laws of all soul, human or Divine. But the consequences of my acts, both outward in the world of Nature and man, and inward in my own being, follow without possibility of suspension, change, or escape. If forgiveness means the remission of the natural penalties of wrong-doing, there is no such thing. They pursue the wrong-doer like "black Care behind the horseman." The superstition that by some muttering of prayers a guilty man can evade the consequences of his own guilt, is one of the most harmful that was ever entertained. True it is, as my correspondent said, that the Christian doctrine of repentance and forgiveness becomes an "incentive to crime." It is wholesome to be made aware of the inexorability of law, that we may learn to pay greater heed to the laws of our own nature, which no man violates with impunity. The wisest of men is he who so lives as to have little that need be forgiven; and who, if he ever falls into moral lapse, at once so shapes his course that he may win the forgiveness of his own soul. This won, he wins the forgiveness of all pure souls as well.

THE CORRELATION OF VITAL AND PHYSICAL FORCES.

[The following is extracted from a pamphlet with the above title by Prof. Geo. F. Barker, M. D., of Yale College, issued as "No. 2—University Series," and dated 1870.]

The last of the so-called vital forces which we are to examine, is that produced by the nerves and nervous centres. In the nerve which stimulates a muscle to contract, this force is undeniably motion, since it is propagated along this nerve from one extremity to the other. In common language, too, this idea finds currency in the comparison of this force to electricity; the gray or cellular matter being the battery, the white or fibrous matter the conductors. That this force is not electricity, however, Du Bois-Reymond has demonstrated by showing that its velocity is only ninety-seven feet in a second, a speed equalled by the greyhound and the race-horse. In his opinion, the propagation of a nervous impulse is a sort of successive molecular polarization, like magnetism. But that this agent is a force, as analogous to electricity as is magnetism, is shown not only by the fact that the transmission of electricity along a nerve will cause the contraction of the muscle to which it leads, but also by the important fact that the contraction of a muscle is excited by diminishing its normal electrical current; a result which could take place only with a stimulus closely allied to electricity. Nerve force, therefore, must be a transmitted potential energy.

What, now, shall we say of that highest manifestation of animal life, thought-power? Has the upper region called intelligence and reason any relations to physical force? This realm has not escaped the searching investigation of modern science; and although in it investigations are vastly more difficult than in any of the regions thus far considered, yet some results of great value have been obtained, which may help us to a solution of our problem. It is to be observed at the outset that every external manifestation of thought-force is a muscular one, as a word spoken or written, a gesture, or an expression of the face; and hence this force must be intimately correlated with nerve-force. These manifestations, reaching the mind through the avenues of sense, awaken accordant trains of thought only when this muscular evidence is understood. A blank sheet of paper excites no emotion; even covered with Assyrian cuneiform characters, its alterations of black and white awaken no response in the ordinary brain. It is only when, by a frequent repetition of these impressions, the brain-cell has been educated, that these before-meaningless characters awaken thought. Is thought, then, simply a cell action which may or may not result in muscular expression—an action which originates new combinations of truth only, precisely as a calculating machine evolves new combinations of figures? Whatever we define thought to be, this fact appears certain, that it is capable of external manifestation by conversion into the actual energy of motion, and only by this conversion. But here the question arises, Can it be manifested inwardly without such a transformation of energy? Or is the evolution of thought entirely independent of the matter of the brain? Experiments, ingenious and reliable, have answered this question. The importance of the results will, I trust, warrant me in examining the methods employed in these experiments somewhat in detail. Inasmuch as our methods for measuring minute amounts of electricity are very perfect, and the methods for the conversion of heat into electricity are equally delicate, it has been found that smaller differences of temperature may be recognized by converting the heat into electricity, than can be detected thermometrically. The apparatus, first used by Melloni in 1832, is very simple, consisting, first, of a pair of metallic bars like those described in the early part of the lecture, for effecting the conversion of the heat; and second, of a delicate galvanometer, for measuring the electricity produced. In the experiments in question one of the bars used was made of bismuth, the other of an alloy of antimony and zinc. Preliminary trials having shown that any change of temperature within the skull was soonest manifested externally in that depression which exists just above the occipital protuberance, a pair of these little bars was fastened to the head at this point; and to neutralize the results of a general rise of temperature over the whole body, a second pair, reversed in direction, was attached to the leg or arm, so that if a like increase of heat came to both, the electricity developed by one would be neutralized by the other, and no effect be produced upon the needle unless only one was affected. By long practice it was ascertained that a state of mental torpor could be induced, lasting for hours, in which the needle remained stationary. But let a person knock on the door outside the room, or speak a single word, even though the experimenter remained absolutely passive, and the reception of the intelligence caused the needle to swing through twenty degrees. In explanation of this production of heat, the analogy of the muscle at once suggests itself. No conversion of energy is complete; and as the heat of muscular action represents force which has escaped conversion into motion, so the heat evolved during the reception of an idea, is energy which has escaped conversion into thought, from precisely the same cause. Moreover, these experiments have shown that ideas which affect the emotions, produce most heat in their reception "a few minutes recitation to one's self of emotional poetry producing more effect than several hours of deep thought." Hence it is evident that the mechanism for the production of deep thought accomplishes this conversion of energy far more perfectly than that which produces simply emotion. But we may take a step further in this same direction. A muscle, precisely as the law of correlation requires, develops less heat when doing work than when it contracts without doing it. Suppose, now, that beside the simple reception of an idea by the brain, the thought is expressed outwardly by some muscular sign. The conversion now takes two directions, and in addition to the production of thought, a portion of the energy appears as nerve and muscle power; less, therefore, should appear as heat, according to our law of correlation. Dr. Lombard's experiments have shown that the amount of heat developed by the recitation to one's self of emotional poetry, was in every case less when that recitation was oral; i. e., had a muscular expression. These results are in accordance with the well known fact that emotion often finds relief in physical demonstrations; thus diminishing the emotional energy by converting it into muscular.

Nor do these facts rest upon physical evidence alone. Chemistry teaches that thought-force, like muscle-force, comes from the food; and demonstrates that the force evolved by the brain, like that produced by the muscle, comes not from the disintegration of its own tissue, but is the converted energy of burning carbon. Can we longer doubt, then, that the brain, too, is a machine for the conversion of energy? Can we longer refuse to believe that even thought is in some mysterious way correlated to the other forces? and this, even in the face of the fact that it has never yet been measured?

In looking back over the whole of this discussion, I trust that it is possible to see that the objects which we had in view at its commencement have been more or less fully attained. I would fain believe that we now see more clearly the beautiful harmonies of bounteous nature; that on her many-stringed instrument force answers to force, like the notes of a great symphony, disappearing now in potential energy, and anon reappearing as actual energy, in a multitude of forms. I would hope that this wonderful unity and mutual interaction of force in the dead forms of inorganic nature, appears to you identical in the living forms of animal and vegetable life, which make of our earth an Eden. That even that mysterious, and in many aspects awful, power of thought, by which man influences the present and future ages, is a part of this great ocean of energy. But here the great question rolls upon us, Is it only this? Is there not behind this material substance, a higher than molecular power in the thoughts which are immortalized in the poetry of a Milton or a Shakespeare, the art creations of a Michael Angelo or a Titian, the harmonies of a Mozart or a Beethoven? Is there really no immortal portion separable from this brain-tissue, though yet mysteriously united to it? In a word, does this curiously-fashioned body inclose a soul, God-given and to God returning? Here Science veils her face and bows in reverence before the Almighty. We have passed the boundaries by which physical science is inclosed. No crucible, no subtle magnetic needle can now answer our questions. No word but His who formed us can break the awful silence. In presence of such a revelation Science is dumb, and faith comes in joyfully to accept that higher truth which can never be the object of physical demonstration.

LIBERALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

[From "The Church Idea," by Rev. Wm. R. Huntington, of Worcester, Mass.]

A man complains that it cramps his liberty to be obliged to accept as certain and indisputable those great doctrines of which the Church has been the witness and the keeper from the beginning. He should feel freer if those points were to be thrown open to debate. But suppose he has his wish: what kind of a freedom would it be? Begin with any one of the primal teachings of Holy Scripture. Take for example that all-important dogma with which the Creed already quoted opens: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth." This brief declaration, simple as it seems to be, admits of at least three doubts.

First, there is the possible doubt as to whether there be any God at all. The Scriptures themselves assure us that such a doubt has been entertained. "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." Here, then, there is room for one controversy.

Secondly, there is the possible doubt whether this Almighty Being, supposing Him to exist, possesses the attributes of a Father. Perhaps there is a God, but is he indeed God the Father? There are many facts in life that seem to militate very strongly against such a belief. It certainly is most difficult to reconcile the mysterious allotments of sorrow, pain and wretchedness we see around us with any simply human conception of fatherhood. Here, then, there is room for another controversy.

Thirdly, there is the possible doubt as to whether God can, in any proper sense, be called the "Maker of Heaven and Earth." There are not wanting those who tell us that to look for any God other than the indwelling mind in Nature, the life-principle of the Universe, the immanent Spirit, is to grope after a nonentity. God and Nature are declared to be coeternous and coeternal, and, if this be true, it certainly is an abuse of language to speak of One who has no existence apart from the heavens and the earth as being the "Maker" of them both. Here, then, there is room for still another controversy; making the third that can be evolved out of one single article of the faith, and that the very one which is least often called in question. Now the ground that the Christian Church occupies is perfectly intelligible and distinct. The Church says, "This is the first article of our belief. We regard it as settled and unchangeable. We are ready to defend it, with the weapons of argument, against attacks from without, but we cannot and will not allow it to be questioned from within; for such a permission would be nothing more nor less than a breach of trust. The faith has been given to us to keep, and we must keep it, or else turn traitors to our Lord."

The position of Liberalism is also perfectly intelligible and distinct. Liberalism says, "No matter where you got this article of faith, it must come into the arena of discussion along with everything else. This is the age of investigation, and no belief is too sacred for our analysis. To draw the line anywhere, and say, 'Here debate must cease,' is to fetter and enslave free thought."

These being the respective positions of the Church and Liberalism, to which are we to look for the truest and best kind of liberty? Or, to put the question in another form, which is indeed the spiritually free man,—he who believes with heart and mind and soul in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, and who in the strength of this belief lives out his life trustfully and hopefully, confident that nothing can possibly harm him so long as the Sheltering Wings and the Guiding Hand are near; or he who, resolutely bent on keeping clear of what he deems the shackles of a definite belief, dwells all his days in a cloud-land of uncertainty, a companionless spirit to whom God is "a feeling," prayer an absurdity, futurity a blank? Which of these two is the really free man? And where lies true liberty,—on the side of the boasted Spirit of the Age, or on the other side of that other and better spirit, the Spirit of the Lord?

The question all lies in a nutshell. Error is bondage. Truth is freedom. If God has revealed truth to men in Jesus Christ, which truth without such a revelation could not have been discovered, is it not as plain as it can be that those who refuse to receive this truth are the bondmen, and those who gladly receive it the free? "Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on Him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." St. Paul's saying about liberty is but the scholar's echo of these the Master's words.

"NOW FIRE A SHOT IF YOU DARE!"—We read in the papers, lately, how a man was saved from being shot. He had been condemned in a Spanish court, but being an American citizen, and also of English birth, the consuls of the two countries interposed, and declared that the Spanish authorities had no power to put him to death; and what did they do to secure his life? They wrapped him up in their flags; they covered him with the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack, and defied the executioners. "Now fire if you dare; for if you do, you defy the nations represented by those flags, and you bring the powers of these two great nations upon you." There stood the man, and before him the soldiery, and though a shot might have ended his life, yet he was as invulnerable as though in a coat of triple steel. Even so Jesus Christ has taken my poor, guilty soul ever since I believed in Him, and has wrapped around me the blood-red flag of His atoning sacrifice; and before God can destroy me, or any other soul that is wrapped in the Atonement, He must insult His Son, and dishonor this sacrifice; and that He never will do, blessed be His name!—C. H. Spurgeon.

MINOR MORALS.—The editor of The Galaxy tells the following story:

A person lately remonstrated with a friend on the impropriety of his playing whist of evenings. The friend argued that the amusement was perfectly harmless. "I don't deny that it is harmless in itself," was the response; "but then consider the example you set!" "But if the thing be harmless, how can the example be harmful?" As it was not easy to answer this logically, the stern moralist could only grow angry and exclaim, as he turned away, "Why, you might just as well attempt to justify dancing!" To justify dancing was evidently, in his mind, as audacious and wicked as to justify murder.

DICKENS says: "I have known vast quantities of nonsense talked about bad men not looking you in the face. Don't trust that conventional idea. Dishonesty will stare you out of countenance any day in the week, if there is anything to be got by it."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I am surprised often at finding fresh instances of persons ready to receive the ideas of Free Religion. It truly seems as though one of those crises in thought had arrived, when the whole human atmosphere is teeming with incipient germs of moral and religious revolution. When in Boston, last winter, I attended what was advertised as 'An Evening with Barnabee.' My friend and I have just been having what may be called 'A Morning with Abbot,' that is, with the numbers of THE INDEX defining 'Free Religion.' My friend, in the absence of 'help,' was washing her own breakfast dishes, and performing sundry culinary operations, and I sat down with her in the kitchen and began reading. Her work was not facilitated by this means, it is true, and sometimes I had to pause while she went down cellar, or out of the room on some mission connected with her duties. At length she suspended her 'chores' for a time, and, taking cool seats in the parlor, she rested from her labors temporarily while I finished my reading. The following comes to me from subscribers whom I obtained for THE INDEX. One lady writes:—'THE INDEX I enjoy thoroughly. All I get or care for in what would be called a religious way I find there. But everything is so full of religion, I don't care much now for any special channel.' Another writes:—'To-day is the perfection of a June Sunday; everything is in an inviting state for a walk to church. But I go not out; stay at home and read Mr. Abbot's discourse, 'The Golden Age.' Ah! I assure you I do not regret having the privilege of an INDEX once a week. If it contained but the weekly discourses of Mr. Abbot, 'tis enough to stimulate me to a few good works. I thank you for introducing me to its valuable sheets.' Still another word from the Indian Territory:—'*P. and N. wish me to tell you that they are delighted with THE INDEX.*' A young lady going to Minnesota, to whom I showed the paper, said at once,—'I must have it.' And arrangements were made by which she should see a weekly sheet. As she started I told her to wave her handkerchief to THE INDEX for me as she passed through Toledo. 'Yes, and for myself, too,' she replied. As you have no pecuniary compensation for your labors as editor of THE INDEX, I think it is but just that you should experience whatever reward may come to you through the sympathy and appreciation of those who value the results of your efforts. I hope I may yet find more subscribers, and some persons who will be interested in specimen numbers. My friend who sits by, says:—'Tell Mr. Abbot I hope we may continue to hear the Voices from the People.' In earnest sympathy with your ideas,

Very truly your friend."

"I wish to be counted as a subscriber to the bound volume of THE INDEX, and you can count me as a life subscriber to THE INDEX. It just suits me. It is worth a thousand times as much as the Book of Fables to be placed in the hands of every human being who can read and understand the English language. I don't know but I should have cried aloud, had the Radical died before I got THE INDEX. Long may it live and prosper."

"I heartily wish success to anything that will aid in breaking down this expensive nuisance, now so popular, called Orthodoxy."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Meeting next Sunday at 10½ o'clock A. M., instead of 7½ P. M., in LYCEUM HALL. The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The regular meetings of the Club will be on Sunday evenings at LYCEUM HALL, immediately after the meetings of the Independent Society. The subject of discussion for the next meeting (which will be Nov. 6, the Hall being otherwise engaged Oct. 30) is—"What action shall be taken with reference to the petition to the Board of Education adopted in the summer?"

DONATIONS.—The INDEX ASSOCIATION gratefully acknowledge the following donations received last week:—

MISS LUCY E. SEWALL, Boston, Mass.....	$ 5 00
BENJAMIN RODMAN, New Bedford, Mass....	20 00
JAMES T. DICKINSON, Middlefield, Conn.....	50 00

SONNET.

What time have died the vesper anthemings,
 The choral murmurs of repose that rise,
 When sunset's glow is fading in the skies,
 From the blest myriads of living things;
 When the low evening wind—its balmy wings
 Laden with dewy freshness—mournful sighs;
 And the lone whippoorwill, in plaintive cries,
 Its ceaseless lay to night and echo sings;
 While sleeps the lake within the arched embrace
 Of star-gemmed heavens, pure counterpart and bright—
 Gleaming from 'neath the waters' waveless face—
 Of those which upwards lure the heart and sight;
 Oh! how intensely glow through soul and sense
 Night's boundless beauty and magnificence!

The Index.

OCTOBER 29, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

TO OUR EXCHANGES.

The American Free Religious Association will hold a public Convention in Toledo on Nov. 7th and 8th. O. B. Frothingham, of New York city, President of the Association, and W. J. Potter, of New Bedford, Mass., its Secretary; Thomas Vickers and Isaac M. Wise, of Cincinnati; Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, several prominent gentlemen of Toledo, and the editor of THE INDEX, are positively expected to make addresses. There is great probability, also, that the venerable Lucretia Mott, well known both in Europe and America for her great services in the cause of humanity, will be present and take part in the proceedings; and it is likewise probable that Miss Lillie Peckham, of Milwaukee, T. W. Higginson, of Newport, R. I., Max Lilienthal, of Cincinnati, Rowland Connor, of Boston, and Edward C. Towne, editor of the Chicago Examiner, will do the same. "Gitskey's Grand Opera House," the largest and best Hall in the city, has been secured for the occasion; and the Convention promises to be large and interesting to all who sympathize with the advanced thought and progressive movements of the age.

Our OHIO, INDIANA and MICHIGAN Exchanges will confer a great favor, not only on the officers of the Association, but also on the people of the country surrounding Toledo, by giving the above notice the benefit of their circulation. Multitudes of persons will eagerly improve the opportunity of attending, if they are informed of it in season.

A PLEA FOR FREEDOM.

It is with great pleasure that we give our readers to-day another of "L. T. I.'s" forcible and singularly beautiful communications. No one, we think, can fail to be struck with the grace and delicacy of its style and the subtilty of its thought. When we published his first "Plea for Necessity," we supposed that speculative questions of this recondite order would be "caviare to the multitude." But we have been gratified to find that it has called out several very excellent articles on the same subject, which have made us congratulate ourselves on the mental character of our contributors and readers. Whatever proves to be a living religious, moral or philosophical question, and one that enlists the real interest of our day and generation, shall find a generous hospitality in our columns. Since, therefore, our subscribers do not yawn over a subject that tasks their minds, perhaps, as much as any that could be named, we proceed without apology to reply to our correspondent's article, point by point.

I. In the note referred to, we spoke only of the common idea of creation, as the "production of something (i. e. substance) out of nothing." If "free choice" is a thing, our friend's criticism holds good; otherwise not. Not belonging to the category of things at all, a free choice is rather a no-thing than a some-thing; and the bottom of the criticism falls out. This, however, may seem to be a merely verbal reply. The idea intended is rather that "every event has its necessary cause;" and that a choice, being an event, must consequently have its necessary cause, i. e. not be free. But, our ground being that volitions do not have necessary causes, but are the activity of free moral beings, we submit that the argument is a mere begging of the question. The very point at issue is—are volitions to be included under the above supposed axiom? If not, the wording of the axiom must be changed to suit the facts.

II. "Not the most zealous believer in freedom can assign moral quality to an act save by knowing its"—motive, not (as our friend writes) cause. He must prove what he here takes for granted, that motives are (efficient) causes. If he succeeds in proving this, we shall simply say that he has disproved the possibility of moral actions, which he will have reduced to purely physical events. Every physical event has its necessary (or efficient) cause; every moral event has its moral (or final) cause—i. e. motive. That is the true statement of the law of causality, in our opinion.

III. If the act is distinguished from the actor, it may perhaps be said that the latter is the efficient cause of the former. But the question is, is the actor necessitated to his act by his motive or motives? We take opposite sides on this question. The actor, however, is not really distinct from his act; all we know is the man acting. L. T. I. must prove that the motive in the man necessitated his action as it occurred, in such sense that it could not possibly have been different. He must excuse us for not letting him take this for granted.

IV. There is here the same lack of discrimination between efficient and final causes. "Cause" is made to cover both; consequently in one sense we admit, in another sense we deny, the statement.

V. The same confusion reappears. The act is indeed an expression of the actor. Which one, out of a variety of motives present, the man freely chooses, reveals his moral character. But if this motive is only one link in an infinite chain of efficient causes, he has no moral character at all; but both he and his action simply express the one eternal Force which operates throughout the chain.

VI. Our friend has here used the word free in the sense of its precise opposite fated. On his theory, the man cannot help himself; he must think as he does think, act as he does act, etc. That is, he is fated "to weigh, to balance, etc." He is not "free," but fated, "to be himself." There is no "freedom" of any sort in the case.

VII. Speaking for Mr. Moody, which we do with diffidence from our own standpoint, we should say that the difference is precisely that between physical causation and moral freedom. If we could conceive the boiler endowed with "sensation and intelligence," but not with will, the "very singular boiler" would find it did no good to ask any such question as—"How shall I act?" This question implies alternatives of action, either of which may be freely chosen; and it would be a very foolish boiler to speculate as to what ought to be its choice, if it had no choice at all. The "how" of physical causation is indeed a "process from cause to effect;" the "how" of moral freedom is a question of duty, which presupposes the absence of necessary causes, the presence of various motives, and the power of choosing among the latter. Kant not only speaks of the "mechanism of Nature" (physical causation), but also of the "absolutely primal beginning of a series of phenomena" (moral freedom); and for a wonderfully strong statement of the metaphysical arguments on both sides of this subject, we refer to the third of his famous "Antinomies."

VIII. We certainly think there is no "fortune," good or bad, in "virtue." We shall not credit fortune with our friend's virtue, but rather our friend himself.

Virtue is "well for man,"—it is the supreme good. But why does L. T. I. talk of "preferring" anything to virtue, when L. T. I.'s theory scorns the very idea of "preference?" Has his moral consciousness for a moment escaped the lock and key of his philosophy?

IX. If the criminal is wholly the victim of his organization and surroundings, we count him insane. But are all criminals insane? Or does not penal legislation necessarily assume that punishable crimes need not have been committed? The Necessarian theory requires that all criminals should be treated as insane. For our own part, we think that this plea of insanity has been ridiculously strained, as in the case of Hiscock, who was declared sane immediately before and immediately after the murder, but insane at the precise moment of its commission. We favor the utmost humanity in the treatment of prisoners, short of making imprisonment an envied lot; but regard for the welfare of society forbids us to favor treating them as irresponsible beings. The allusion to "Inquisitions," etc., strikes us as a little wild. It is entirely answered by the consideration that society does not, like conscience or the usurping Inquisition, pronounce upon the guilt of actions, but only upon their tendencies and social results. Penalties are an appeal to fear, one of the motives of free moral beings; but this appeal is not addressed to the insane, because they have lost the power of intelligent free choice. In fact, law is the public recognition of moral freedom.

X. We candidly admit that we do not pretend to show how freedom is possible; we limit ourself to showing that it must be a fact, since conscience, which presupposes it, is itself a fact. This simple argument L. T. I. has very succinctly and fairly stated towards the close of his article. If his last three lines mean that he regards conscience as illusory, he unflinchingly accepts the consequences of his own theory,—or would do so, if he entirely disused the word freedom, which, on that theory, has no meaning at all. In other words, logical Necessarianism is pure Fatalism.

In conclusion, we ought to add that, philosophically, we should much prefer Fatalism, with its one law of physical causation, to Freedom, with its two laws of physical and moral causation; for philosophy delights in simplicity and unity. But in this case Nature is not so simple as human systems would fain make her; and it is part of our very religion to accept her teachings without seeking to run them in the mould of our own hypotheses. Truth first—last—and all the time!

A PUZZLE.

TIPECANOE CITY, O., Oct. 3, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Will you, for the benefit of your readers, please be so good as to solve the following metaphysical problem?

A few days ago I was conversing with a Methodist clergyman, who affirmed he could do anything within the range of easy physical accomplishment. I took issue with him; and, as a test, I proposed that he should lay his hand on a red-hot stove before us, and keep it there five seconds, and perform the feat within the next five minutes. He declined doing it, and said it was not because he could not, but because he would not. "Yes," I said, after the five minutes had expired, "you have been willing not to do it all the time, and of course you could not will to do it at the same time, for you cannot will to do opposite things at the same time. The will had to precede the act, and the will to do was what you could not get; for the reason, as you said, that you were not going to endure so much pain and make a jackass of yourself, besides." Could he, or could he not, under the circumstances, have done the thing proposed? No doubt, you can conceive of circumstances that would have enabled him to do it.

Respectfully yours,

EDWARD L. CRANE.

[We do not doubt that the above-mentioned clergyman could, in his own pungent phrase, have "made a jackass of himself," if he had chosen to do so; and we are inclined to think that he actually did it unawares. As we do not desire to imitate him, we "give up" our correspondent's conundrum.

The theory of Freedom does not require that a man should will to will, or have power to do so. It only requires that, when he wills, he should be a free cause, and not a mere effect.—ED.]

A SECOND PLEA FOR NECESSITY.

DETROIT, Sept. 30, 1870.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Pray excuse me if I use the letter on "Morals and Causation" by E. R. L., in your issue of the 24th, as a pretext for saying a few words more upon this question of Freedom and Necessity.

I. In your comments upon a letter entitled "Matter and Law," in the same issue referred to above, you admit the absurdity of holding that something can come from nothing; yet very little analysis, I think, will show that this is precisely what free choice must be—a something from nothing. If not from nothing, then from something; and how can it come from something without being determined thereby?

II. The difficulties of the case, as I see them, run deeper than you appear to recognize, if I understood your editorial on "Fate and Freedom" in THE INDEX of August the 20th.

In the paragraph beginning—"We admit the requirements of logic," &c., you say—"The question at issue is really this, is man in all his actions under the law of absolute causation?"

Yes? Then man is neither free nor a moral being.

No? Then he is both."

Now with great confidence I assert that it is just as impossible to discover morals (such as the advocate of freedom requires) in one case as in the other.

If man's actions are under the law of any causation, whether absolute or relative, they are not free.

If under the law of no causation, they are not moral.

Not the most zealous believer in freedom can assign moral quality to an act save by knowing its cause. Men always know, or assume to know this, in forming an approving or condemning judgment. This knowledge is an indispensable pre-requisite to the assignment of moral quality, yet refers to something lying back of the will.

III. In your comments on E. R. L.'s letter, you say—"We deny that motives are efficient causes." Suppose that we admit that they are not. The fact still remains that something, within or without the man, caused the act; and whatever that something may be, whether simple or complex, is just as fatal to freedom as motive would have been. Motive is just as manageable a cause as any other, just as intimate, as near to the man; action therefore is as much like freedom as any that can be had.

IV. But to go further (for the sake of clearing the ground), it is certainly safe to say that either the act was caused or came without cause. I do not think we need argue to prove that in the latter case it is impossible to conceive of it as having moral quality, or indeed any quality.

V. If the action has for its cause the grossest of matter, or the finest attenuation of spirit, it (the action) can in either case be but an expression of that which caused it. Therefore, I repeat, if caused, it cannot be free; and, if not caused, it cannot be moral.

VI. Man is a something in which certain powers, faculties, feelings, inhere. They have their base in him. They are himself. In action he expresses the aggregate of these, or the temporary ascendancy of some of these. He is free to do this. What other or further freedom is possible? He is free to weigh, to balance, to speculate, to remember, to dream, to act. He is free to be himself. Again I ask, what further freedom is possible? In fact, what is this freedom save a condition rendering possible the full exercise of each function and faculty which man possesses or which he is? Before we have the freedom, we must have the being that shall be free. This being is a bundle of conscious activities, hungers, wants, laws, hopes, fears. Now if we had power to endow him with all the freedom of which our imagination can conceive, how could we do more than give him freedom to express himself—freedom to do as he wishes—in a word, to make his action the result of his uncontrollable dictation, to be himself the source of authority? Yet this is just the freedom he has, and his only restraint is that he cannot be and not be at the same time.

This is precisely the freedom and the restraint of which all are conscious; and so far as we can conceive of an existent being, such limitation is incident to existence—and claims for any freedom beyond this proves it, under analysis, self-destructive.

VII. Mr. Moody, in his letter on this subject in THE INDEX of Aug. 20, queries why man, if not free, should put to himself the question—"How shall I act?"—and that steam in the boiler should not ask itself a similar question. That man has sensation and intelligence is a sufficient answer, without requiring that he should differ from the boiler in other respects.

If the boiler had experienced any of the complexities of suffering and enjoyment on account of previous action, and at a later date remembered it, it would be a very singular boiler indeed, if it did not ask itself—"How shall I act?"—and this, too, although it might be bound in every fibre of its boilerhood to do at last precisely as it wanted to.

In selecting the word "how," Mr. Moody has chosen one singularly fatal to his own argument. The how of anything—of everything conceivable—is a process from cause to effect. Our reason can grasp no other "how" than this. Neither can our imagination picture any other. "How" implies method—mode of doing—and comes at once inevitably within what Kant calls the "mechanism of Nature," where even the advocates of freedom admit no freedom is. I agree with Mr. Moody that "the how comprehends the ought"; but if it does, that is the end of freedom in either case.

VIII. In your editorial referred to above, you say—"There is no virtue in fortune, good or bad." My assertion was that there is "fortune in virtue," that it is good fortune. Pray tell me if you think it is not?

If not, then indeed "the times (of the Universe) are out of joint."

If virtue is not well for man, why be virtuous? If anything is better, then surely we should prefer it to virtue. There must be harmony here, or we need not look for it anywhere.

IX. In your answer to E. R. L., you put the difficulties of the necessitarian argument in a strong light, when you ask us to feel the same towards the murderer that we do towards the gunpowder with which he commits the crime. Yet the feeling of the wisest and best men to-day is in such a case quite as consistent with the necessitarian argument as with that of the freedomist. We may feel at first that no punishment is too severe; yet in our best moods, although revolted, we pity and would seek to reform; we are horrified, not merely at what the criminal willed to do and did, but at what he is, at the brutal organization, and at the dim, passionate spirit looking out of it. When we see the resemblance so strong between the act and the actor, we are a little uncertain as to the propriety of heaping on him our righteous indignation, and begin to see that crime is very much like a loathsome disease. Why this strange harmony of parts, even in the very discords of sin? It is as if organization and temperament caused it all.

On the other hand, we are quite as far from reconciliation, if we hold that it is right to inflict punishment because the criminal wilfully did the crime, when he might have done otherwise. This view, if carried out, gives us Inquisitions and every phase of organized cruelty. Neither do I see where reasonably it can ask punishment to stop, for the action of a free will cannot give differences of degree; yet these are the only differences analysis can discover, or (I think) imagination conceive.

X. What mysterious powers may be included in this strange something we call personality, or how largely it may draw on the infinite, I know well that I know not; but certain it is that we cannot undertake to show how freedom is one of these powers, without showing conclusively that it is not one of them, and must fall back upon the argument that, while we cannot show how freedom is possible, we are yet conscious of that which can only exist with freedom, and that therefore freedom must be.

The necessitarian doubts the accuracy of our consciousness, or our conclusions herefrom, or both.

Very truly yours,

L. T. I.

FRIENDLY COMMENTS.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1870.

ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I receive THE INDEX every week. I admire it for its clear, positive thought, and because it is vitalized by a love for human rights and freedom in their broadest, highest, and most practical signification. It is truly an INDEX, pointing to the great creedless, priestless, and popeless church of the future. It belongs to the vanguard of religious and governmental reform, advocating harmony and unity with all nations upon the basis of the innate goodness of the human soul, which is the only foundation upon which perpetual peace can be secured.

There is one feature in the editorial criticisms of correspondence which deserves especial notice and commendation. I refer to the liberality and charity manifested towards the different opinions which have been expressed through your columns. Only by such practical examples can the spirit of persecution, intolerance, and dogmatism be cast out from the religious world.

I consider the published lectures of themselves worth the price paid for the paper. They are radical, clear, and refreshing. They strengthen the faith and encourage the hope in a brighter and more glorious future for humanity. An acquaintance of mine, a friend of humanity, first put THE INDEX in my hand, for which I thank him sincerely. Had I the means, I would give every liberal freethinker an opportunity of judging of its merits by sending him a copy for six months. This, I think, would insure its perpetual publication.

"A conscious, intelligent first cause," and "freedom in necessity," are subjects which interest me very much; and I hope at some future time to write my thoughts upon them.

Please credit me with the enclosed five dollars, and send THE INDEX to the following addresses.

Yours in the cause of human freedom,

E. W. MEACHAM.

THE SYRACUSE RADICAL CLUB.

EDITOR INDEX:—As the liberals throughout the country just now seem to be somewhat interested in the organization of local Radical Clubs, and as I am receiving many communications in which inquiries are made in relation to the Syracuse Club, I ask the liberty of saying a few words through your columns, in answer to these inquiries.

As to the organization of our club, it is made up mostly of members outside of all our religious organizations. The truth is, Syracuse has had a preacher of free religion for the last thirty years in the person of Samuel J. May. If he has not preached it in words (which I think he has), he has preached it in his daily life. As you, Mr. Editor, so truly said in the Christian Examiner of January, 1868,— "During a ministry of forty-seven years, every reform that promised to help lift mankind out of spiritual or social evils, has found in Mr. May a friend equally ready to give and take hard blows in its defence. Peace, temperance, education, anti-slavery, woman's rights, the succor and elevation of Indians and canal boys, whatever humanitarian movement came to his notice, at once enlisted his sympathies and hearty efforts." At one of his society meetings some years since, I heard Dr. Clary, a member, say—"For many years we tried to convince him that his house was not a poor-house for all the destitute from Buffalo to Albany; but we finally had to give it up." This man, more than any other one man, I believe, had prepared the mental and spiritual field here for the organization of our club. Then, when the first number of THE INDEX was issued, we found quite a number here who at once sympathized with the sentiments therein expressed; and the interest most of us had taken in the formation and success of the Boston Radical Club suggested to us the idea of forming some local organization here that should be to this city what the Boston Club was to the whole country. After a very little consultation among the liberal minds here, it was decided to make the experiment. A notice was published in our daily papers inviting all who favored the movement to meet at a certain office in our city, and organize a Radical Club. But few came together at the first meeting, and those mostly strangers to each other; but the few resolved that a club in which perfect freedom should be granted to all to utter their convictions on all subjects relating to the interest of humanity, should be organized, and should continue to exist so long as three persons could be found in Syracuse to sustain it. They formed and subscribed articles of association as brief as they could be drawn, and adjourned for one week. (These articles appeared in No. 29 of THE INDEX.) As we found it necessary to secure a room for our weekly meetings, we decided to establish a Free Reading Room at the same place, to be open on each day of the week. The Corresponding Secretary opened a correspondence with all the liberal and most of the principal newspapers in the country; and to their credit, allow me to say, the most of them sent us their papers and magazines free, and others at a greatly reduced subscription price.

Many of our citizens are contributing valuable books for the Library that we hope to have at some future time. And I came near forgetting to state that in my opinion the lecture you gave in this city on your return from the annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, entitled "Pagan and Christian Idolatry," accelerated the organization of our movement. So far our meetings have been well attended and seemingly profitable. And all our liberal friends here feel the organization to be a valuable auxiliary to the work of reform, and now desire to urge liberals in all sections of the country to organize in some similar way. Let Truth, Freedom, and Humanity be the watchwords of these organizations, and the long neglected field of this world be their field of labor!

THE SPREAD OF SKEPTICISM.

MR. ABBOT:—These assertions—"that skepticism has appeared many times in the course of centuries, the same in substance, though now in one guise and now in another; but each successive form of it has found first a defeat, and then a grave"—"There is no cause for anxiety now, while the spirit that quickeneth the dead in trespasses and sins keeps on in its victorious way"—are as palpable untruths as ever could be affirmed. The insincerity of such a statement is plain, for the same men are continually harping in their pulpits and papers upon the insidious spread of infidelity; but when occasion requires, they will immediately turn, and endeavor to lull their hearers into serene confidence that all is well.

It is either a fact, or it is not, that infidelity is spreading throughout the enlightened Christian world. The Catholics are regarding it as a fact, and are endeavoring with all their power to meet the issue. The Ecumenical Council was called principally for the purpose of checking the inquiries of those who doubt; and their endeavors in this country to control the public schools show that they are aware of the dangers to which their church is exposed by permitting their children to come under the influence of the spirit of the age. This intangible spirit of the age that pervades the very air is the spirit of inquiry and skepticism; and whether opposed by Catholics or Protestants, has obtained a momentum that will overcome all opposition. The knowledge of law and order prevails, and its power is gradually crushing and grinding out the strong superstitions that have held it in bondage. There is no progress except in knowledge; and with this truth, so well established, it is utter folly for Christianity, under whatever form, to hold mankind from advancing into the light which is dawning before them.

FREEDOM AND NECESSITY AGAIN.

SALEM, OHIO, Oct. 18, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Please permit me, as briefly as possible, to compare views with yourself and correspondents on the above subject. Like L. T. I. and Mr. Crane, I believe that human actions are no exception to the universal law of cause and effect, while at the same time freely admitting all the "facts of conscience;" but whether this really involves an inconsistency or not, each one must judge for himself, viewing the matter from his own standpoint.

I hold that every human action is, like every phenomenon of nature, the necessary result of a chain of circumstances extending backwards to infinity, and that no action could have been different unless there had been a difference in this chain of causes extending and ramifying infinitely. And while I contend that it makes no sort of difference to the logical merits of the question what becomes of the popularly received notions of the moral qualities of actions, when they come to be viewed from this stand-point, I still contend actions may be good or bad, just as health may be good or bad; for immorality is a disease of the moral nature, the same as any physical disease is a derangement of the physical system.

Good or moral actions are such as are productive of good, or at least harmless, to others, and are pleasant to remember; or, according to Webster, "conformed to rules of right; virtuous; just, &c.," and these qualities seem to me to be inherent in the actions themselves, and to have no connection with the causes which produced them.

You say to Mr. Crane that, "if every action has its necessary cause, self-approval and self-disapproval are sheer nonsense, and the words right and wrong lose all meaning." To this I would say, that self-approval or disapproval are really nothing more than the state of being glad or sorry that certain actions were performed; and if to this "nonsense" is in any case added, I insist that it is not the fault of the Necessarian philosophy.

It is, I take it, in the words used to describe a very natural state of mind, or the conception of the significance of those words, that the "nonsense" inheres, if anywhere, and not in the state of mind to which they relate; and those who use wrong words, or attach a wrong significance to right words, are responsible for it, and not the advocates of a philosophy which exposes it.

The words right and wrong can never "lose all meaning," though somebody's idea of their meaning may suffer. All errors are more or less entrenched in words and phrases, the meaning of which must be modified when the errors are abandoned.

True philosophy should not concern itself about the sentimental and verbal consequences of its conclusions. But this I admit; it can never be experimentally demonstrated that an action might or might not have been different, with no difference whatever in any of the influencing circumstances which preceded it except the volition to do it. The infinitely complex and extended ramification of causes and effects which has preceded, and may have necessarily culminated in any particular action, can never be duplicated, and nothing short of this can ever settle the question. Everybody feels that he has the power of choice; that he could, in the case of any voluntary action, have chosen to act differently, if—; and right there comes the whole controversy.

Yours,

JOS. W. THOMPSON.

[When Mr. Thompson reduces all moral sentiment to the "being glad or sorry"—i. e. to simple pleasure and pain,—he falls into that very ignoring of the facts of conscience which is part and parcel of the Necessarian theory.—ED.]

BIBLE-READING IN SCHOOLS.

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, Sept. 12, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—As there is considerable thought nowadays upon the question of reading the Bible in schools, I should like to say that I should have no objection to reading the Bible in schools, provided it be read by course, so that scholars may know just what it contains. It was reading it by course, while a boy, that made me a disbeliever in its inspiration; and the same thing has been the case with thousands of others. I think it a difficult matter for any one to read it through attentively and not have doubts of its infallibility; while those who never read it at all are the most loud and valiant in their defence of it, and nearly three-fourths of the professors of religion know nothing of its contents but what they hear read from pulpits. How many reflecting minds could "stand the storm," were they to begin at Genesis, and, as they read chapter by chapter, have an admonitory voice exclaiming in their ears—"This from the God of the whole universe—this from an omnipotent, omniscient, and perfect Deity?" Would not children, even, see that through the whole record of the old Testament the Deity is made to conform to man, instead of man to Deity?

If our School Boards would bring the Bible into schools, and insist upon the whole being read, I believe the strongest opponents of the measure would be the clergy; for they dare not read the whole of it from their pulpits. It is this view of the matter that accounts for the Catholic Church prohibiting the reading of it by their laity. They consider it dangerous to perfect faith. In short, do you know a full-grown liberal but has read the Bible—do you know a real, persecuting, bigoted religionist (except a priest) that has ever read it much? Church members, as a class, do not read it much; and those who follow in their wake never read it at all. I have sometimes thought the best liberal lecture that could be given would be to read the Bible to a congregation by course, and have it well digested as to its inspiration as you pass along.

HENRY BRONSON.

THE CHEROKEE ROSE.—The legend of the Cherokee rose is as pretty as the flower itself. An Indian chief of the Seminole tribe, taken prisoner of war by his enemies, the Cherokees, and doomed to torture, fell so seriously ill that it became necessary to wait for his restoration to health before committing him to the fire. And as he lay prostrated by disease in the cabin of the Cherokee warrior, the daughter of the latter, a young, dark-faced maid, was his nurse. She fell in love with the young chieftain, and, wishing to save his life, urged him to escape; but he would not do so unless she would flee with him. She consented; yet before they had gone far, impelled by soft regret at leaving home, she asked leave of her lover to return for the purpose of bearing away some memento of it. So, retracing her footsteps, she broke a sprig of the white rose which was climbing up the poles of her father's tent, and, preserving it during her flight through the wilderness, planted it by the door of her new home among the Seminoles. And from that day this beautiful flower has always been known, between the capes of Florida and throughout the Southern States, by the name of the Cherokee Rose.—Southern Farmer.

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE CONVENTIONS.

Public Conventions under the auspices of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are to be held this Autumn as follows:

At CINCINNATI, Tuesday evening, November 1st, and Wednesday, November 2d, through the day.

At INDIANAPOLIS, Thursday evening, November 3d, and Friday, November 4th, through the day.

At TOLEDO, Monday evening, November 7th, and through the day, November 8th.

Local Committees will give due notice of the place and hours for meeting in their respective towns.

The friends of reason and freedom in religion, the seekers after truth, all those who would have religion applied directly to questions of social reform and practical life, the foes of sectarianism, of superstition, of dogmatism, in the cities where the meetings are to be held and from all the country around, are urged to attend these Conventions. Let there be a grand rally. Those, too, who are not in sympathy with the Free Religious Association are cordially invited to attend.

Practical subjects, bearing on the vital issues of the day, will be discussed, such as "Radical Organization," "The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition," "Bible Worship," "The Sunday Question," "The Relation of Religion to the State in America."

Able speakers will be present, prepared to address the Conventions on these subjects. Time will be allowed also for free discussion.

Among the speakers positively expected to attend all the Conventions are O. B. Frothingham, President of the Association, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, Francis E. Abbot, Thomas Vickers, Miss Lillie Peckham, and Wm. J. Potter. It is also hoped that Col. T. W. Higginson, Rabbi Max Lilienthal, Rowland Connor, and Edward C. Towne will be present. Others have been invited.

Any newspapers interested that will make an item of this notice will confer a favor.

Before the next number of THE INDEX appears, two of our Conventions will have been held. It will be seen by the notice that we go directly from Cincinnati to Indianapolis, beginning at Cincinnati Tuesday evening, Nov. 1st, and closing at Indianapolis, Friday evening, the 4th. The following Sunday, Nov. 6th, our speakers separate to speak at various places where their services may be desired. And on Monday evening, the 7th, and Tuesday the 8th, we gather again in a Convention at Toledo. There has been some difficulty in arranging the time of the several Conventions, and possibly an impression prevails in some quarters of different dates from those just stated for the meetings at Indianapolis and Toledo. But the time is fixed as here given. And we desire to state that we owe the opportunity of holding our Convention at Indianapolis at the time specified to the courtesy and kindness of the Catholic priest and his society in that city. The only hall in the city suitable for our use had been engaged by them for a festival on the days we wished it; but when they discovered our perplexity, they generously offered to postpone their festival and to put the hall at our service. We hope we may see some of them at the Convention; and that they may see, notwithstanding the great differences between free religion and the Church of Rome, that we are simply aiming to bring all mankind in their religious relations upon this broad human platform of mutual equal respect and good will, which is shadowed forth in just such acts of regard and courtesy as theirs.

We have every reason to suppose that all the Conventions will be full of life and interest. The officers of the Free Religious Association mean to do their part to the best of their ability. Let the people be on hand. We have no sect and no churches to which we send our call. We make an appeal to the American people. The only credentials that are asked for in our Conventions are those of free manhood and womanhood.

A WORD OF EXPLANATION.

Rev. E. C. Towne in the first number of his magazine, The Examiner, refers to the Free Religious Association in a way that requires, perhaps, some notice here. In a brief article entitled, "Free Religion not Anti-Christian," he says:—

"It has been assumed by a portion of the public, of late, that free religion implies disavowal of Christianity. The Radical and THE INDEX have been taken to represent the entire breadth of this new interpretation of religion. The course of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association, in adopting THE INDEX as an organ of communication with the public, has given color to this assumption. Yet nothing could be farther from the truth. The movement which the application of freedom to religion has produced is not in general unchristian or anti-Christian, or other than avowedly and resolutely Christian both in fact and in name."

Again, in an article headed "A Criticism of our Aim," he says:—

"We, on radical Christian ground, say to each of these faiths (Judaism, Hinduism, Mahometanism, etc.) hold your ground and keep your name, and let us have a world-fellowship of the different religions of the earth. Our idea, . . . and the idea we supposed the Free Religious Association was to represent, was this unity of religions, with liberty and diversity both of names and special tenets. We wanted to see all classes of Christians come together, Catholic, Calvinist, etc., etc., on a platform of generous human recognition of one another, and with them, if occasion should be found, men and women of other names than the Christian."

There is something in these remarks, and in the general tone of the articles from which they are taken, which implies that the action of its officers has been such that the Free Religious Association, since it was organized, appears to have changed its ground and purpose,—especially in its attitude towards Christianity. It is to this point that we wish briefly to speak. In our opinion the Association is not now, and never has been, either "Christian" or

"anti-Christian." But people will differ from this opinion according to their definition of Christianity. We should state the matter thus, taking into consideration the variety of definition. But Mr. Towne, defining Christianity essentially as the free development of reason and intuition in religion, would say, of course, that the Association is "Christian." On the other hand, the editor of THE INDEX, defining Christianity as a religion that necessarily limits and represses reason in deference to a standard of external authority, must say, of course, that the Free Religious Association is antagonistic to it—is "anti-Christian." Yet both of these men are interested members of the Association and active workers in it. And the organization is so broad and free that both find ample room in it,—the man who insists on the Christian name and the man who disavows it; the "Christian" and the "non-Christian," or "anti-Christian." Moreover, the word "Christian" was purposely omitted from the constitution of the Association for the sake of this large fellowship. It was understood that the word, however broadly some Christians might define it, would work practical exclusion; and the Association was aiming at the largest possible spiritual fellowship. We think we are right, therefore, in saying that the Association, leaving Christianity undefined, cannot be said to be either "Christian" or "anti-Christian." It has among its members and officers those who would call themselves Christians, and also those who no longer claim the name, though they may once have had it, and those too who have always rejected it. And in this respect, we are sure, Mr. Towne would find no fault with the Association. It is carrying out his "idea" of what it ought to be.

We are, therefore, somewhat at a loss to understand what Mr. Towne means when he says, that the movement which the Association was intended to represent is "in general avowedly and resolutely Christian both in fact and in name." For did not the Association designedly omit the name, so as better to represent the movement? And is not a very considerable part of the movement not only outside of the Christian name, but outside of Christendom,—in Judaism, in Hinduism, in Mohammedanism, in Pseism?

As to the connection of the Association with THE INDEX, we wish simply to state that the offer of the editor and proprietors of this paper to devote a portion of it to the free use of the Association was accepted by a unanimous vote of the Executive Committee, and that it was expressly understood, (the editor insisting on this provision), that, as he would not be responsible for the columns given to the Association, so the Association should have no responsibility for his part of the paper. And the stipulation is now printed in every number issued. Whether, in spite of this understanding, a portion of the public might get the impression that the Association shared the special views of the editor in respect to Christianity, was a question which did not seem to give the Committee much concern; perhaps, because it has not seemed to them so important as Mr. Towne deems it that the Association should be reputed "Christian." They adopted a department in THE INDEX, just as they might have adopted a department in the Independent, or in Dr. Wise's Israelite, had it been offered on the same terms, and a connection could have been made with the same convenience.

In the second of the paragraphs above quoted, Mr. Towne gives his view of what the Association was to be. He seems to us in this statement to make too prominent the idea of an alliance of "all classes of Christians," and too subordinate the intended inclusion of people of "other names than the Christian." The sympathy and fellowship of all the great religions, and the equality of all religious believers in respect to spiritual rights,—this has always seemed to us a very central feature of the Association. And because the Association has asserted this so strongly in its very organization, we have never expected that the Orthodox sects of any religion would contribute any considerable number of members to our ranks, though our doors are freely open to them. Believing in a religion of specific and supernatural authority, they cannot accept this radical principle of equality of spiritual rights. It is death to all their exclusive claims. Calvinists and Catholics, the sects generally, will not consent to have the claims of their faith to be a special revelation put on the same ground with the claims of other faiths. Here and there individuals may be found in the Orthodox sects in whom the sentiment of freedom predominates; and these gravitate naturally to our platform. Rev. Mr. Malcom, the Rhode Island Baptist, made one of the best pleas for religious liberty that has been made in our meetings. He found the chord of sympathy with the Association's aims, and touched it unmistakably. But this faculty is rare in the sects. We would hold out hands and hearts to welcome it, we would keep our platform for its utterance. But so long as Orthodox means soundness in creed, and the sects believe in their sectarian lines and fellowship, we do not expect much accession from these quarters. Mr. Frothingham seems to have set this matter in its right light in his address at the last annual meeting, when he said: "Any person may belong to the Free Religious Association, whatever his creed; but no person can belong who holds his creed to be changeless, authoritative, or indispensable. . . . He cannot, because he will not."

One word as to those who are drawn to the fellowship of the Association, keeping their old specific religious names,—a point on which Mr. Towne insists with some strenuousness. Of course they will keep them, if they think the names important. The Association lays down no rule in that respect, except not to take any one of the names itself. But our own personal opinion is that the distinctions of names in the actual fellowship would soon get obliterated. Mr. Towne says, "Christianity is free religion," and he claims to be a Christian. Rabbi Wise says, "Judaism is free religion," and he calls himself still a Jew. The Free Religious Association says nay to the name of neither. It asks them simply to utter their convictions. And Dr. Wise and Mr. Towne will probably stand together on the platform of the Association at Cincinnati next week to give utterance essentially to the same faith. Having found the same thing, they will not insist strongly on calling it by different names; nor will the hearers care so much which is the Christian and which the Jew, as what that great reality of faith is which has drawn them by such different paths together. And by and by, generations hence, we expect both names, "Jew" and "Christian," will drop away, and be remembered only for their historical significance; while the faith shall stand pure and vigorous, creative and progressive still, binding humanity into one fellowship, and yet, perhaps, go unnamed. And, as helping toward this end, the agency of such work as Mr. Towne proposes to do in the Examiner and Dr. Wise is doing in the Israelite, is certainly to be recognized. To show the devotees of any special religion that the most vital and essential thing in their faith belongs in some shape to all religions is a pathway to universal fellowship.

[I agree with Mr. Potter that the Free Religious Association is "neither Christian nor anti-Christian," though I believe that its principles really strike at the very heart of Christianity as an historical world-religion. This is my own opinion; but I would scrupulously avoid all semblance of committing the Association to it.—F. E. ABBOT.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SEASON OF 1870-71.

MASON & HAMLIN CABINET ORGANS

Important Improvements.

Patented June 21, and August 23, 1870.

REDUCTION OF PRICES.

THE MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO. have the pleasure of announcing IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS in their Cabinet Organs, for which patents were granted them in June and August last. These are not merely meretricious attachments, but enhance the substantial excellence of the instruments.

They are also enabled, by increased facilities for manufacture, to make, from this date, a FURTHER REDUCTION OF PRICES on several leading styles.

Having completed and added to their former facilities a LARGE NEW MANUFACTORY, they hope hereafter to supply all orders promptly.

The Cabinet Organs made by this Company are of such universal reputation, not only throughout America, but also in Europe, that few will need assurance of their superiority. For years the Company have been unable to supply the constantly increasing demand for their instruments, being always largely behind orders, though producing about twice the amount of work of any other maker of instruments of the class. This extraordinary demand is evidence that they have been successful in carrying into effect two rules which it is their purpose to adhere to rigidly, so that they may be said to be principles of their business. These are:

1. To make the very best work, and only the best; availing themselves of the best results of inventive genius, every improvement, wherever effected, and every facility which highest skill, ample experience, and liberal use of abundant means can command.
2. To sell always at the lowest possible price, reserving to themselves the least remunerative profit. As cost of production is diminished, prices are reduced, and they always print their lowest prices, which are therefore subject to no discount. The extent of their business and the enormous number of Cabinet Organs which they now have occasion to produce, enables them to employ various machinery, and a division of labor which would not be possible in a smaller business. They are thus enabled to make the present reduction in prices, and to sell their work at even less than the prices commonly demanded for inferior instruments, and less than the cost of production without such extraordinary facilities.

They now offer FOUR-OCTAVE CABINET ORGANS, in quite plain cases, but equal according to their capacity to anything they make, for $50 each. THE SAME, DOUBLE REED, $65. FIVE-OCTAVE DOUBLE REED ORGANS, FIVE STOPS, with Knee-swell and Tremulant, in elegant case, with several of the Mason & Hamlin improvements, $125. THE SAME, extra, with new Vox Humana, Automatic Swell, &c., $160. THE SAME RESONANT CASE, with new improvements, $200. FIVE OCTAVES, THREE SETTS REEDS, SEVEN STOPS with EUPHONY, a splendid instrument, $225. TWO MANUEL CABINET ORGANS, FOUR FULL SETTS OF REEDS, NINE STOPS, $375. THE SAME, RESONANT CASE, with the new improvements, the finest instrument of the class made, $425, &c. Many other styles in proportion.

A NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, with full information, and reduced prices, is now ready, and will be sent free, with TESTIMONIAL CIRCULAR, presenting a great mass of evidence as to the superiority of these instruments, to any one sending his address to the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN CO., 154 Tremont Street, Boston, or 596 Broadway, New York. 42-1-3

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for IMPURE BLOOD.

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD, Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, truly,

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,

Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y. Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD, Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKE, ESQ., Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.

(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicine everywhere.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

SPIRITUAL BEAUTY.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., April 14, 1867.]

"And yet I say unto you that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these."

MATTHEW, VII, 29.

"The Master said, 'I have not seen one who loves virtue as he loves beauty.'"

CONFUCIAN ANALECTS, IX, xvii.

"O beloved Pan, and all ye other gods of this place! Grant me to become beautiful in the inner man."

SOCRATES, Plato's Phædrus, § 147.

"The close connection between the good and the beautiful has been always felt, so much so that both were in Greek expressed by the same word, and in the philosophy of Plato moral beauty was regarded as the archetype of which all visible beauty is only the shadow or the image. We all feel that there is a strict propriety in the term, moral beauty."

LECKY, Hist. Europ. Morals, vol. 1, p. 79.

Surpassing, indeed, is the glory of the lilies,—magnificent the snowy ermine of their more than regal apparel. Beside their glowing hues, the imperial purple of Cæsar shows more ghastly than rouge on the cheek of the belle, whom daylight with its unwelcome revelations has caught lingering in the ball-room. With the very master-piece of his ingenuity and skill, with the most splendid product of his art, man stands utterly abashed before the most careless effort of Nature. The triumph of artistic genius, the last result of conspiring head and hand, placed side by side with the houstonia, the violet, or even the buttercup, must be tossed aside as worthless. The umpire will wrest the crown from the head of Solomon, in all his pomp, and lay it in homage at the foot of the lily.

On her own plane who shall dare to enter the lists with Nature? Shall human bungling aspire to rival the matchless workmanship of the Perfect Artist? In the creation of grace and beauty, shall man venture to compete with God? Let him learn his place, and abate the pride of his pomposity. The sculptor and the painter are the merest copyists of form or color, and in the fairest incarnations of their ideal must confess the transcendent superiority of Nature's meanest reality. As the stars overflow with light, so Nature showers miracles of perfect loveliness on every hand in an everlasting "golden rain" of beauty.

Yet let not man be overpowered by this bewildering profusion of charms. If unconquerable on her own level, Nature kneels in submission on a level higher than her own. The secret of divinest beauty is, after all, not with her, but with man. Solomon, after all, is king of the lilies also, or might have been. There is a higher glory than that of color or form, in which man finds no rival even in rainbow, star, or flower,—a more delicate beauty than ever shone in forest or in lake. Fair, gloriously fair, are the lilies of the field; yet how much fairer are the lilies of the soul! The virtues which testify of man's kinship with God, the graces which lend all its charm to human life, the affections which blossom in the stillness and peace of home, and exhale a spiritual fragrance in comparison with which the attar of roses is cheap and vulgar,—is there no beauty here? Is the meaning of that word "beauty," on which we love to linger so long, quite exhausted by the inventory of the senses? Or is that which delights the eye and ear the mere symbol of a higher beauty still? Who has not paused on those words of our English Bible—"O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness!"

There is a thirst for beauty to which the utmost of loveliness that Nature can offer is merely a stimulant. I never look on a lovely landscape, a dainty flower, a beautiful face, without a consciousness of unsatiated craving. The more I delight in the beauty before me, the stronger is my sense of a beauty unsupplied. I cannot explain it,—I know not what it means; but the beauty of the most beautiful brings quite as much pain as pleasure. Like the breeze which sweeps over the strings of an Æolian harp, and fills the solemn hush of midnight with strains of sweetest melancholy, the beauty which dwells in outward Nature awakens the chords of the soul to a music of delicious pain. Only the gross and coarse nature is proof against this subtle influence. The finer the grain, the more complete the response.

It is not a mirthful thing to gaze on beauty. Beauty has a strange, electric power over the soul which stirs it to its depths, and hushes gayety. "I am never merry," says Shakespeare, "when I hear sweet music." Of course not,—he would not be Shakespeare if he were. He that is moved to laughter in presence of great natural beauty, either of sight or sound, is insensible to that higher beauty which it suggests, but cannot reveal. We are made to embody more beauty than we behold. Is it not this unrealized possibility that creates our inward, half-painful, wholly uncontrollable restlessness in the presence of that which is surpassingly fair? A secret sorrow, perhaps self-reproach, that we ourselves are not fairer still, lends a mournful undertone to the joy that bursts into the song of admiration. Why should we feel humiliated by Nature's loveliness, if we were not born to be lovelier than she? I take it that here is a suggestion of our spiritual possibilities, a divine hint of our spiritual destiny, which it were wise to heed. I surely can not stigmatize these experiences, deep and real though undefinable, as either morbid or sentimental: to be without them is to miss the most delicate lessons of the world in which we live.

Yet, though we grieve over the absence of spiritual beauty in our own being, do we not often rejoice over it, even to enthusiasm, in those we love? Is there one within reach of my voice who has not discerned how infinitely lovelier is the lily of the soul than the lily of the field? In fact, we never love what does not appear beautiful in our eyes. If we disregard homely features in the face, it is in virtue of lovely traits in the character. What is a nobler luxury than the privilege of admiration? He lays me under the profoundest of obligations who compels me to admire him. Yet what is admiration but the thrill of delight at beholding spiritual beauty? No man is imbruted who still admires goodness; and whoever, by being good, awakens men out of the stupor of self-imbrutement into the glow of genuine admiration and heart-homage, is the divinest of benefactors.

I find the extravagant claim of Jesus to the homage of mankind justified to some extent by the fact of his spiritual beauty. Outward Nature, prodigal of her charms, must yield to him the palm of a higher loveliness. His purity is brighter than her stars,—his tenderness more exquisite than her flowers. And because his idealized figure moves in the souls of men, shaming them before their own ugliness, and stirring them into aspiration by its very beauty, he survives the wreck of centuries as one of the noblest friends of his race, the truest prophets of God.

This his true mission is independent of the "authority" with which his followers, in blind zeal, have crowned him. I sometimes think his disciples more cruel than those who led him to Calvary. The fierce Romans made him King in mockery,—put on him the purple and the crown of thorns, and thrust into his hand the sceptre of a reed; but when their bitter jest was ended, and the edge of their merriment dulled, they stripped off the mock-royal insignia, and crucified him as a man. But his followers keep up the mournful comedy to-day. Afraid of men's neglect, if the forms of kingship are disused, they bend the knee, replace the crown which is in verity still a crown of thorns, thrust again into his hands that sceptre of reeds which signifies no actual royalty, salute him Lord and King, and, instead of discriminating and intelligent admiration for his spiritual beauty, yield him only a blind worship for his supposed "Divine authority." Out of respect for Jesus himself, as well as respect for my own freedom, I stand aside from the idolatrous throng, and take no part in their acclamation—"Hail, King of the Jews!" But, forgetting this scene of well-meant mockery, I behold the divineness of that human beauty still peerless among men, respond to it with aspiration and living love, and glow inwardly with the admiration which I thank God I cannot withhold from the "beauty of holiness."

Is this so very hard to understand? Is the union of an independent intellect with spiritual reverence and affection so very rare a thing as to be incomprehensible? I acknowledge the divine right of Beauty to be admired and loved,—how, then, can I help glowing with admiration for that fairest flower of humanity, that spiritual master-piece of God? But I also acknowledge the divine right of Truth to be believed and obeyed,—how, then, can I postpone my own convictions to those of any Master, or accept as true what I do not see to be true with my own spiritual vision? This, then, should be our attitude towards Jesus,—appreciative yet manly, reverent yet independent, modest yet self-respecting, grateful yet not idolatrous. To him let us cheerfully accord all that man may give to his brother,—to ourselves let us reserve what every man should keep to himself.

Spiritual beauty,—to make ourselves beautiful in spirit,—is not this "our being's end and aim?" Is it not to be in the likeness of Him who is the Author of Beauty? We are weighed down and oppressed at heart by a harrowing, grinding, gnawing sense of our own deformities. We feel each defacement of our own ideal as painfully as the wounded soldier feels the surgeon's saw grating on his shattered bone. The unlovely tenor of our lives,—the lapses of temper, the ebullitions of self-will, the triumphs of selfishness, the snake-like stings of envy, the corrosions of insincerity, the slimy touch of impurity, the moral paralysis of cowardice,—how unspeakably hideous do these things look in the faithful mirror of conscience, and how nervously do we sometimes strive to hide ourselves from our own inspection! And how sternly does conscience wrest away our hands from before our face, and present again the mirror with its hateful image to our reluctant eyes! O for beauty of heart, of life, of spirit!

What would we not eagerly pay as the purchase-money of spiritual beauty! But the fixed price of spiritual beauty is obedience to spiritual laws; God will accept no other currency. The identification of our will with the Universal Law—that is the price to pay. Let the full tide of Universal Life course through our souls, and it will slowly correct the malformations of the past.

There is but one source and origin of this beauty of the spirit for which we pine. A hanging-basket, given by a kind friend, was suspended one winter at my study-window, and cheered me daily with the sight of a delicate vine, growing in perfect grace with many a fair festoon. During the long winter months, this living reminder of summer was a missionary of God, preaching to me daily from the one, exhaustless text of loveliness. I once forgot to water it for two or three days; and when the thought of my forgetfulness flashed through my mind, I went to my neglected little friend, fearing it had become too late to save its life. But no! it had drooped a little, but still seemed vigorous and strong. I raised the pot which held the plant, and the mystery was solved. Through the hole in the bottom of the pot, a mesh of tiny roots hung down, and reached into a little reservoir of water below, which had secretly nourished it during the days of my neglect. From this unseen fountain, life had ascended, and kept the leaves green and their beauty fresh; and, thanks to its fulness, my little vine still flourished as fair as ever.

How true a type is this of the Fountain of All Life and Beauty,—ever unseen, yet doing good in secret, and feeding the roots of our being under all neglect of human friends! Outward discouragements may foil us,—deprivation and disappointment may weigh upon us,—care and anxiety, worry and vexation, may besiege us,—sorrow and bereavement may turn our day into night,—temptation may assail us on every side,—yet if through all we live inwardly with God, if out of sight our souls are replenished by the Infinite Soul, we shall still preserve and increase the measure of spiritual strength, life, and beauty we have attained. What no eye hath seen, and no ear heard, is the real fountain of the loveliness we crave. Wise are they, who value more highly symmetry and grace of spirit, than abundance of luxuries or pre-eminence of fame, and who have learned the secret of spiritual beauty by faithful obedience to the laws of God.

Though every clear-eyed soul must be out of conceit with itself, how many a comely soul it sees around it! The whole true happiness of life comes from such. Who shall estimate the good accomplished by a single beautiful spirit! To endure the hard labors of the home with a meek and patient temper, to check the complaining or fretful word that leaps to the lips under petty provocations, to suffer in silence when injustice or coldness or unkindness in those we love wounds us to the quick, to answer petulance with cheerfulness, and anger with the soft word that turneth away wrath, to keep that inner sweetness of heart and thought which transfigures so many a gentle mother or wife or sister with the beauty of heaven,—to do this, as is done in many an unpretending home, without ostentation, without self-consciousness even, is to render a service to humanity that no words can estimate. It is through this spiritual beauty in each other that we behold God most clearly, and learn to find him in our own souls. The gentle, unselfish, saintly spirits that inhabit our homes, or shine upon us in our daily walk through life,—the noble men and self-sacrificing women who are often least appreciated under their own roofs, and who minister holy thoughts and better impulses to all who see the daily beauty of their lives,—these, dear friends, let us cherish and love, with profoundest reverence and tenderest gratitude! Who can measure the debt we owe to them? Who cannot remember unspeakable obligations unconsciously conferred by them? Surely, to be beautiful in soul is to fulfil the whole duty of man.

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH SAYS—

"We are pleased to learn that Rev. O. B. Frothingham has accepted the position of editor of Theodore Parker's unpublished works, and now has in hand the lectures on 'Historic Americans,' which have been so long promised, but which have not yet seen the light. We trust this Association will be the means of rapidly presenting the other writings of Mr. Parker, for all of which there never was a greater demand than to-day. Mr. Frothingham is admirably fitted for his task. Mr. H. B. Fuller will continue to publish."

A debating club in Worcester lately discussed the question—"Whether a rooster's knowledge of day-break is the result of observation or instinct."

THE ANCIENT LAKE-DWELLERS.

[From "Man's Origin and Destiny," by Prof. J. P. Lesley: pp. 124—129.]

It is hard to comprehend the possible beginnings of civilization in a wilderness of forests and mountains, pelted with storms, and horrible with the cry of wild beasts. Yet such was Europe down to a recent date, i. e., to within a few centuries of the Christian era. Such was all North America two hundred years ago, with the exception of a few river bottoms, a few glades, and a few estuary marshes on the sea coast. In Europe, also, such places early became refuges and nurseries for men. It is therefore in the open plains of Languedoc, on the borders of the delta of the Rhine, and on the great chalk basin of central and northern France and southern England that relics of the most ancient races have been chiefly found. But even here they are commingled with the remains of tigers and hyenas, wild boars and bulls, the bear, the wolf, and the deer, and even of the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus, and the elephant, in such numbers and of such a size as to tell a plain story of the most savage existence. When we remember that the only weapons which the men of the cave had at their command were fire, and the bow and arrow, the flint hatchet, fastened to its wooden handle with a willow withe or a shrunken piece of deerskin, or the pike pointed with a reindeer prong or a wild boar's tusk; and that the only farming implement they knew of was a paddle of flint, chipped thin and broad and worked by hand without a handle, our wonder grows how civilization could have found a time and starting point.

It was, no doubt, in order to avoid their natural enemies, the wild beasts, and perhaps also to defend themselves against each other, that some tribes, whose hunting grounds lay neighboring to lakes, betook themselves to a peculiar mode of life. They planted upright logs in the lake bottom, supporting them with heaps of stones, and lashing them together with wicker work. On these they laid a wooden platform, communicating with the shore by a wooden bridge or causeway. On this platform stood their wigwams. Here the women and children were comparatively safe when the men were on shore hunting, or farming, or at war. On the edges of the platform they sat to fish. In the centre of each wigwam perhaps was a layer of earth to cook their fish upon. Trapdoors in the village floor received the offal, the bones of animals after the marrow had been extracted, fragments of broken pottery, the waste of spoiled nets, and ruined weapons. Hundreds of the sites of these villages have been recently discovered in the lakes of Switzerland, Bavaria and Austria, and thousands of such relics of their domestic life, but as yet only two skulls. It is, therefore, certain, that these people were not habitual cannibals, for in that case human skeletons would be abundant. It is equally evident that they either burned their dead, or buried them on shore. That both these customs were pursued at different times we have good evidence. It is remarkable that the oldest skull yet found in these lake dwellings presents us again with all the low type features of the Neanderthal cranium; great ridges over the orbits of the eyes, a suddenly retreating forehead, and extremely small capacity. It contained what seems an undeveloped brain; but yet it could not have been (as some were inclined to consider the Neanderthal cranium) the skull of an idiot. These people were far from being idiots. They were only animals. The essential difference between an idiot and an animal consists in this fact: the idiot, like the unborn foetus, is not aware of his relations to surrounding nature; his life goes on chemically, not consciously. The animal, on the contrary, is wide awake to his position and its demands. Indeed, the quickness and many-sidedness of this self-consciousness is the nicest scale we have by which to grade the animal creation. Behold the deer, for instance; how alive to every sound and motion! how skilful to hide! how prompt to fly! And yet I have myself stood for half an hour, by my transit instrument, in the woods of the Towanda Mountains, waiting until my men cut out a line down the long steep slope into a valley; and during all this time I have seen a deer standing motionless, watching the brilliant spot of light which the sunbeams through the trees made on the brass cylinder of my telescope, not fifty paces distant, unaware of my presence, and unconscious of danger. In vain, says the poet of old, is the net spread in the sight of any bird. The consciousness of its relations is not complete in any animal; but it is more complete in some than in others. The horse is superior to the deer; yet the horse rushes into, not out of a burning stable. The ape is superior to all animals below man, because his powers of observation have more scope, his comprehension of emergencies is more logical; he shows an inventive genius harmonizing with this higher degree of self-consciousness, and hence he more perfectly imitates the brutal customs, the vices, and the virtues of mankind. The difference between the ape and the civilized man lies in the limitation of the consciousness of the ape to his physical and passion relationships to nature; while the self-consciousness of the civilized man deals also with the subjects of civilized thought, and with the invisible and eternal worlds. But this is the precise distinction between the cave or lake-dwellers of early Europe, and the Londoner or Bostonian of to-day; and thus we are returned once more to the idea of the affiliation of the apes with mankind in the early stages of its existence.

That these old lake-dwellers were in no respect idiotic is evident from the very nature of the case: a race of idiots could no more continue to exist than unborn children could. But their handicraft is still more conclusive evidence. In the museum of M. Troyon of Lausanne I had the pleasure of examining the piece of a door, half burned, consisting of three boards, two of which lay side by side, but not rabbited together; the third board crossed the other two at right angles, to hold them together; but instead of being nailed or pegged fast to them, it was as regularly dovetailed into them as a carpenter of our days would have done it. I saw also among these curious objects pieces of twisted thread and knotted net. Their clothes were probably of skins, and loom-weaving was as yet unknown, but specimens of plaited cloth have been found. I saw needles of bone to sew with; and pieces of charred baked bread in the form of flat round cakes; and grains of wheat and barley. The small wild apple and pear of the Swiss woods have also been dredged up, wild plum stones, and beech and hazel nuts in great abundance. How pleasant would it be to have a dinner scene of those days by Teniers, or a page of table-talk by Coleridge! What a contrast would it present to the Round Table of Arthur and his paladins! or to a dejeuner at the Maison Dore in 1865! The table can be seen, with its dish, in the Museum of the Irish Academy; but where are the guests? It was discovered in a peat bog, in the county of Tyrone, ten feet beneath the surface. The table and the dish were each scooped out of a solid piece of wood, apparently fir. An oblong table, with its ends curved inward, and set on four short legs, four and a half inches high, truncated cones, connected at their bases by a low rim, in which are two cord holes; and an oval dish four or five inches deep, in its edge two holes answering to the two holes in the rim of the table, and probably slung to it on the back in traveling. Beside the dish lay a large heap of hazel nuts, probably an autumnal hoard just gathered for winter's use. Perhaps they were uproariously enjoying their repast, when interrupted by the rush of some carnivorous beast, scattering their merriment.

How long the ages were during which these lake-dwellers were inhabited, I do not know. We know that they existed still in the days of Herodotus; and the Swiss antiquaries believe that those of Nevilles and Chavannes in the Canton de Vaud continued to be dwelt in to the sixth century after Christ. There are sufficient evidences in the articles found to distinguish them as of very different ages. The iron age of the Romans is represented; the preceding age of bronze; and a still more ancient age of stone, perhaps going back to the times succeeding the retreat of the Swiss glaciers. We cannot tell, therefore, at what time wild apples, plums and berries were exchanged for wheat and barley bread; nor when the skins of beasts were replaced by plaited cloth. The best scale of years we have is got from Rutimeyer's list of the animals on which the ancients fed, and especially by the marked change from wild to domestic flesh. In all of the lake-dwelling deposits, even the oldest, we find the bones of the domesticated ox, sheep, goat and dog; and intermixed with these in various localities, bones of the horse and ass, bones of the elk and stag, the roe and fallow-deer, the ibex and chamois, the bison and wild bull, the small swamp hog and the great wild boar, the wolf and fox, the bear and badger, the marten, polecat, ermine and weasel, the otter and the beaver, the hedge-hog, squirrel and field-mouse, the wildcat and the hare, the frog and the tortoise, the wild swan, goose, two kinds of ducks, and fifteen other kinds of birds. All that contained marrow are found split open; this is invariably the case with those of the bull and bison. In the most ancient villages, like those of Wangen and Moosseedorf, the greater predominance of bones of the wild stag and roe, over those of tame cattle, show a decided preference of the chase to a more civilized mode of life; the tame pig is wanting, goats outnumber sheep, the fox was an habitual dish.

THE MARTYRDOM OF GIORDANO BRUNO.

[From Lewes' "Biographical History of Philosophy," pp. 273-374.]

On the 17th February, 1600, a vast concourse of people was assembled in the largest open space in Rome, gathered together by the irresistible sympathy which men always feel with whatever is terrible and tragic in human existence. In the centre stood a huge pile of fagots; from out its logs and branches rose a stake. Crowding round the pile were eager and expectant faces, men of various ages and of various characters, but all for one moment united in a common feeling of malignant triumph. Religion was about to be avenged: a heretic was coming to expiate on that spot the crime of open defiance to the dogmas proclaimed by the Church—the crime of teaching that the earth moved, and that there was an infinity of worlds: the scoundrel! the villain! the blasphemer! Among the crowd might be seen monks of every description, especially Dominicans, who were anxious to witness the punishment of an apostate from their order; wealthy citizens were jostling ragged beggars; young and beauteous women, some of them with infants at their breasts, were talking with their husbands and fathers; and playing about amidst the crowd, in all the heedlessness of childhood, were a number of boys squeezing their way and running up against scholars pale with study, and bearded soldiers glittering with steel.

Whom does the crowd await? Giordano Bruno, the poet, philosopher, and heretic, the teacher of Galileo's heresy, the friend of Sir Philip Sidney, and open antagonist of Aristotle. Questions pass rapidly to and fro among the crowd; exultation is on every face, mingled with intense curiosity. Grave men moralize on the power of Satan to pervert learning and talent to evil: Oh, my friends, let us beware!—let us beware of learning! let us beware of every thing! Bystanders shake significant heads. A hush comes over the crowd. The procession solemnly advances, the soldiers peremptorily clearing the way for it. "Look, there he is—there, in the centre! How calm—how haughty and stubborn!" (Women whisper, "How handsome!") His large eyes are turned towards us serene, untroubled. His face is placid, though so pale. They offer him the crucifix; he turns aside his head—he refuses to kiss it! "The heretic!" They show him the image of Him who died upon the cross for the sake of the living truth—he refuses the symbol! A yell bursts from the multitude.

They chain him to the stake. He remains silent. Will he not pray for mercy? Will he not recant? Now the last hour is arrived. Will he die in his obstinacy, when a little hypocrisy would save him from so much agony? It is even so; he is stubborn, unalterable. They light the fagots; the branches crackle; the flame ascends; the victim writhes—and now we see no more. The smoke envelops him; but not a prayer, not a plaint, not a single cry escapes him. In a little while the wind has scattered the ashes of Giordano Bruno.

FEATHERS AND BIRDS.

[By Col. Higginson, in the Woman's Journal.]

When John P. Hale was nominated for the Presidency by the old "Liberty Party," he was strongly opposed to presenting more than one main issue at a time. "Liberty first," he said. "In firing at a bird it is useless to take aim at each feather separately. Bring down the bird, and the feathers will come too."

In the early days of the discussion about woman's position, there was a good deal of uncertainty which were the feathers and which was the bird. It was a period of great agitation in regard to all social problems. Brook Farm had but lately gone under; in Paris, the national workshops had hardly run their course. Some of the leaders of the woman's movement in America were also ardent Fourierites, and thought it necessary to make each set of resolutions a complete chart of the New Jerusalem. The movement was so earnest that there was but little nonsense. Its aim was so high, that there was nothing impure. But there was a great deal of collateral discussion; a great deal of aiming at feathers. The call for the first National Convention in 1850 (of which call the writer was a signer) announced "the general question of woman's Rights and Relations" as including (1) "her education, literary, scientific and artistic; (2) her avocations, industrial, commercial and professional; (3) her interests, pecuniary, civil and political; in a word, (4) her rights as an individual, and (5) her functions as a citizen."

It was an immense programme, but the Convention did not shrink from it. The second Convention appointed large Standing Committees on Education, Industry, Civil and Political Functions, Social Relations and Publications—besides a Central Committee of twenty-nine! In the resolutions of these Conventions, the claim for suffrage is buried under such a load of words that you can hardly find it, while they ascend very far into dim air in their other channels. For instance, the first Convention calls for "such unions as may become the guardians of pure morals and honorable manners—a high court of appeal in cases of outrage which cannot be and are not touched by civil or ecclesiastical organizations, as at present existing, and a medium for expressing the highest views of justice dictated by human conscience, and sanctioned by Holy Inspiration." These "unions" were not marriage unions of course, but a sort of lofty volunteer tribunal, which should deal out a nobler justice than is now accessible. It was a sublime ideal, doubtless, but perhaps a little too abstruse for the very first lesson in the book.

This rather vague and high-flown element in the movement was fortunately met and controlled by an element of clear common-sense, of which Lucretia Mott was the best embodiment. And it is saying a great deal for this agitation, that, while thus born with one foot on the clouds, it ultimately came down to the earth. It was perhaps best that it should take a survey of sea and sky and land to begin with; and then make its choice of a definite point afterwards. That definite point was the suffrage. When the Woman's Rights Conventions ceased, and the Woman Suffrage Conventions began, it meant business. It meant that we had begun to aim at the bird, and had ceased shooting at the feathers.

It is, of course, well enough for a woman's journal to discuss incidentally every interest of woman, or every social fact that concerns her. Diet and clothing, education and wages, marriage, parentage, or even divorce, may come in for illustration or for opinion. These things may also be mentioned incidentally, wisely or unwisely, in public meetings. But the moment they are put on a level with the main issue, the moment we cease to subordinate them utterly to the one immediate demand for suffrage—that moment we have gone back to the days of inexperience, and are taking aim at the feathers, not the bird.

The right of voting is to an American the one central right, the embodiment and the guarantee of his liberties. His opportunities of education and a just place in the world are all endorsed upon the face of the ballot. A single vote may seem as unimportant as a single United States flag; but the dignity and value of the whole national experiment are represented there. The ballot alone cannot accomplish everything; but it stands for more than anything else. With the right of suffrage, woman becomes an equal, human being; without that, no matter how much you pet her, the question still remains open, whether she is more than a doll. To an individual woman it may often be less important whether she can vote, than whether she has good health, a good education, or a good husband. But to woman, as a class, the comparison is all the other way. These blessings are in a measure accidents, not guarantees; the right of suffrage is the only guarantee. Give her that, and she is man's equal. After that, all other questions will settle themselves. Let us decide first whether she is to be recognized by the body-politic as a part of the human race. When she is, all other arrangements will adapt themselves to this new fact. Bring down the bird, and you will not need to look far for the feathers.

THE DEVIL IN A STREET CAR.

Persons whose business requires a daily trip from one portion of the city to the other, are not unfrequent observers of "meetings" between unprincipled men and thoughtless, if not unprincipled, women.—Especially is this true of those stages and cars which have for a terminus the Fulton ferry.

A few evenings since a circumstance occurred growing out of these meetings which terminated rather differently from the most of them.

As the car stopped at the intersection of two streets to wait for passengers, a man of the "Broadway statue" type entered and took a seat beside a young girl of prepossessing appearance, apparently quite youthful.

Opposite these new-comers sat a demure Quakeress watching closely the actions of her neighbors.

Some of the passengers were drowsy and did not notice the flirtation. Others did, but were too accustomed to such scenes to pay more than ordinary attention to the conduct of this pair. Not so with the little Quakeress; her dark eyes flashed indignation at the man and looked pleadingly at the girl. She grew nervous; the small hands trembled violently, and it was plainly evident that her position was one of torture. But she stood it bravely until the scamp handed a card, closely pencilled, to the girl, who extended her hand to take it.

This was too much, and the self-constituted protector, with a swift movement, jerked the card from the young girl, and tearing it in pieces, threw it into the face of the original owner.

With tears in her eyes, and a tremor in her voice, rendered eloquent by emotion, she beseeched the young woman to be more prudent, and pay no attention to the brute who had insulted her.

By this time the passengers were aroused, and listening with no little interest to the earnest voice of the strong woman offering protection to her erring sister, who, to her credit be it said, did not spurn the rebuke administered, but hung her head in shame.—The other actor in the scene found the air too oppressive and retired.

There was a strong desire on the part of the passengers, composed mostly of men, to applaud the fearless woman, but she quietly left the car, accompanied by the imprudent girl, who probably owes her salvation to her interference.—N. Y. Standard.

"A GOOD DEED IN A NAUGHTY WORLD."

[From the Banner of Light.]

In the Banner of Sept. 17th was a paragraph, editorially commenting on the hard experience of a young and unfortunate girl, of Detroit, who had, in an evil hour, lapsed from virtue, but afterwards repented and resolved to reform; but she was hunted down by puritanical pharisaism, and driven forth from two places in which she had secured a home as a domestic; and in her despair she attempted suicide. We commented on the case as we thought it deserved, inquiring whose fault it was that reformation was hindered as it is. The paragraph seems to have left an impression on the mind of Mr. Robert Fulkerson, of Elkhart, Indiana, who puts the pharisaism of Detroit to open shame by the following proposition, which he forwards to us. He says he will gladly give that girl a home, his family consisting only of himself, his wife, and a little boy eight years old. If she is good to work, and conducts herself with common propriety, he engages to give her fair wages, and treat her kindly and as one of the family. He would like to have some kind person in Detroit find her and send her to his house, he engaging to pay all fair expenses. If she is satisfied with the place, she can stay as long as she pleases. And he takes pains to add that his wife "never scolds!" His house he describes as at the corner of Pigeon and Fourth Sts., fourth door west of the Baptist Church. He will meet her at the depot, or any one of the omnibuses will take her to his place.

ITALIAN VERSION OF THE LORD'S PRAYER.—"Our Father who art in the Vatican: Infallibility be thy name: Thy Temporal Sovereignty come: Thy will be done in Europe and America as in Ireland. Give us this day our tithes and tithes, and forgive us our trespasses as we give plenary indulgence to those who pay penitently unto us: And lead us not into Ecumenical Councils, but deliver us from thinking: for thine is the crozier, the key, and the tiara. Rome without end. Amen."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Many Spiritualists that I am acquainted with speak highly of THE INDEX. At their recent camp meeting at Walden Pond, Edward S. Wheeler, one of the editors of the American Spiritualist, of Cleveland, in one of his addresses to a large audience, spoke very enthusiastically of it, and recommended to his hearers to subscribe first for his paper, and next for THE INDEX—published at Toledo, Ohio, one of the muddiest cities in our muddy West! I am glad at the prospect of the continuance of THE INDEX during another year. If it survives through a third year, its success thereby will surpass my strongest hopes. Such publications cannot compete in external success with 'Mammon' newspapers. The transcendental Dial for three years uttered its oracle and became dumb. Andrew Jackson Davis's Herald of Progress for about three years announced the tidings, then ceased. Jesus for three years preached. Mammon could stand it no longer and crucified him. If Abbot's INDEX continue for three years to point to holier spheres and lead the way, it will be because Mammon is somewhat spiritualized and therefore liberalized."

—"No. 37 did not come, please send it. I saw the other day an explanation of the medium trick,—'the blood-red writing on the arm.' When you have written on your arm with the wrong end of a match, the writing appears when you rub your arm with a wet hand. As to the strips of paper rolled up into balls, the point is that the name wanted is almost always written more carefully than the others, and is thus detected by the medium who gets an opportunity to read the lot. I saw this in a review, in the Literary World, of the 'Genial Showman,'—a book about Artemus Ward. The celebrated medium, Charles Foster, used to do this trick."

—"I desire you to book my name and address for a file of THE INDEX for the year. During the time of my subscription I shall circulate THE INDEX as much as possible. I find that many don't like it much; it seems a rather bitter pill to the multitude, but to the few it has its sweet. My acquaintance with it so far has been like unto the meeting of two friends. I predict a glorious future for THE INDEX, but a still greater and more glorious future for the Free Universal Religion, so long as its aim shall be to free mankind from the bondage of ignorance."

—"I am sorry I cannot send names of other subscribers from this town, being satisfied that the good of this community would be promoted by heeding the teachings of your valuable little paper. Am gratified to learn that sufficient encouragement is given to warrant the assurance that THE INDEX is getting upon a permanent foundation, and its publication will be continued."

—"A number of THE INDEX fell under my eye to-day, and I became forcibly impressed with its Orthodoxy on the subject of religion. I have long felt that the world needed a fearless medium for the advocacy of truth against the crying evils of the religious world, and I am inclined to hope THE INDEX may be regarded as such an one."

—"In the last Toledo Blade I see your Prospectus for a new paper which bears the title of THE INDEX. From what you propose to inculcate in its pages I apprehend it will be the kind of a paper that the community has long stood in need of—which I hope will help to dispel superstitious bigotry and intolerance."

—"I have just returned from my Western trip and have read the sermon on the 'Sabbath.' As you must have it in type, can you not strike off a few thousand copies in a tract? I think our Club would take a number of hundreds for circulation in this city. I wish both sermons could have been printed in one tract."

—"No. 28 makes a pretty good back-bone for an argument, if any one likes to try it on."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held every Sunday evening at 7½ o'clock, in LYCEUM HALL. The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—Meetings immediately after the meetings of the Independent Society. Subject for Nov. 6:—"What action shall be taken with reference to the petition to the Board of Education adopted in the summer?"

CONVENTION OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.—This Convention, already fully advertised in THE INDEX, will be held at "Gitskey's Grand Opera House" on Nov. 7 at 7 o'clock P. M., and Nov. 8 at 10 A. M., 3 P. M., and 7 P. M.

THE NEW FAITH.

"I believe in the Communion of Saints."

APOSTLES' CREED.

From out this creed, which long to me
Was all in all a verity,
Have fallen, one by one, away
The—"I believe's,"—until to-day
Faith rests assuredly on none
But God, who is the All—the One.
Out of them all, but this, I find,
Gives me a pang to leave behind;
For, in the heaven my fancy paints,
The sweet "Communion of the Saints"
Makes up its highest joy for me,
When "face to face we there shall see Even as we ourselves are seen,"—
The barriers that come between Kindred of soul while here they stay
All broken down, and swept away,
When Infinite Love shall help us read
Truer than by the word or deed;
When thought, in the unclouded ray
Of that divine effulgent day,
Unfettered by one sordid fear,
Trusting to Love, shall be sincere.

But then, I fear, this heavenly dream
Is like to every selfish scheme
Whereby man, disappointed, strives
To make good sad and futile lives.
The all-good here is unattained;
Somehow, somewhere, it must be gained;
Sometime the now o'ershadowed joy
Must come to man without alloy.
So he dreams dreams; and heaven is made
Of hopes earth has in ashes laid.
As such communion blest would be
The best a heaven could hold for me,—
As here and now, though cramped and bound,
Foretokens of this bliss I've found,—
My soul would reach out hands of love
To clasp with those dear hands above.

But stay! May not these glimpses be But hints that even here can we
In saintly fellowship abide,
Clasping true hands, though there denied?
The saints are not all canonized,—
Nay, may be now in sin baptized,
And through its fierce, baptizing fire
In virtue's path be mounting higher
Than feet unscathed can ever reach.
From those far heights, O may they teach
That Infinite Love scans not the deed,
But deeper, deeper far will read.
The saints are not all glorified;
But close at hand, on either side,
And all unheeded day by day,
We pass them by on life's highway,
Nor stay to catch the low, sweet tone
That, though to our dull ears unknown,
Would startle us with glad surprise,
Did we our soul's kin recognize.

One little word, a tear, a sigh,
A quick upglancing of the eye,
Tells of a rich, sweet life, within
The outside folly or the sin.
There's tenderness 'neath harsh word,
Accents of love that ne'er are heard,
Thoughts pure and true, ideals high,
Lost in the manner blunt or shy;
Nay, blessed deeds we do not know,
Right hand to left would never show;
An open mind and reverent air
In some who never said a prayer;
And patient eyes, though dimmed with tears,
And secret trust o'erlaid with fears;
And saintly spirits, grieved and jarred,
By pain and care all worn and marred;
And feeble hearts that love the good,
And aye would do it, if they could.

O Father! give us Thy clear sight
To read these hidden lives aright,—
Thy "perfect love that casts out fear,"
That we may dare to be sincere,
And lay these cheating masks aside,
That now our real selves divide.
So shall we in this glad day read
A broader and a nobler creed,
Beneath a love-illumin'd sky
Thus in our hearts confess it—"I Believe in God, the Father dear,
And in Him infinitely near;
And I believe in every son
Of His, who in his life has done
The best he could; and I await
A fellowship divinely great,
So full and free and true and sweet,
That all as brothers yet shall meet,
Growing towards Thee, O Perfect One,
A Father Thou, and Man a Son!"

Is this, too, but the far-off chime
Of endless joy-bells? This the time
Whereof we dreamed? God doeth well!
And though the chime should prove a knell,
I steadfastly believe, even then,
In EVERLASTING LOVE—AMEN!

The Index.

NOVEMBER 5, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

The last number of Nature contains Prof. Huxley's Address at the recent Liverpool meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. It is a very interesting summary, historical and theoretical, of the "spontaneous generation" controversy. Prof. Huxley defends the doctrine of "biogenesis," i. e. that all living forms are derived from previously living matter,—at least, so far as experiment furnishes grounds for any conclusion at present. But referring to the first commencement of life on the earth, he says that, if he were enabled to look back to that period, he "should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from not-living matter." If this expectation is a reasonable one (and there can be no alternative but that of witnessing a miraculous creation, which would be simply "spontaneous generation" on a most astonishing scale), why is it not just as reasonable to expect that, if we could only increase our microscopical and other facilities of scientific investigation, we should witness the same phenomena at the present day? Surely Prof. Huxley would not admit that the laws of Nature have changed, or can be supposed to have changed. Whoever rejects the miraculous-creation hypothesis is necessarily driven to accept some form of the evolution hypothesis, unless he stolidly refuses to think; and whatever evidence is sufficient to discredit the former, by that very fact establishes the latter. It is a little curious to see how even Prof. Huxley hesitates to admit this necessary inference. But the very best English minds lose their reckoning, unless they feel demonstrable facts under their feet at every step. They need to be strengthened by a little of the German faith in "Vernunft."

A POOR SIGN.

The Woman's Journal, referring to Harvey Jewell's foolish speech at the Massachusetts Republican Convention, lately expressed itself in this fashion:—

"Intelligent women of Massachusetts! Remember this man, Hon. Harvey Jewell, and his Worcester speech, and remember it never to forgive it!"

The Boston Journal replies thus:—

"The Woman's Journal says the women will never 'forget it nor forgive it.' We hope our fair friends are not going to enter the field with such a vindictive spirit as this. If they do, we fear politics will not be much improved by their action."

The Woman's Journal retorts as follows:—

"We purpose the same vindictiveness against Hon. Harvey Jewell, as do the officers of the law against criminals. When they can catch the offenders, then they mean to punish them. There is no vindictiveness in this—only justice. Mr. Jewell in his speech has remanded the women of the Commonwealth to the category of fools, lunatics, felons, unpardoned rebels, paupers and babies, from which they were seeking to escape, evidently, from his language, believing that to be their proper status. We think he will live to find that speech an impassable gulf to his political aspirations."

It seems that the hasty impulse of feeling is ratified by deliberate second-thought. We are sorry for it. The advocates of a just cause simply forfeit their own moral dignity when, in the heat of resentment, they stoop to pursue any person with threats. If, instead of educating public opinion by arguments and moral appeals, they deliberately undertake to flagellate opponents with the scourge of revenge misnamed "punishment," or dragoon them into submission by appeals to their political selfishness and fear, they make reform itself an evil to be reformed. The scalping-knife and tomahawk are weapons which women, at least, cannot afford to use. If they have no faith in nobler weapons, it will be wise for them to keep out of a warfare in which they will be worsted. There is quite enough of this personal politics in the world as it is. We want less of it, not more. If women are going to come down to it instead of raising it up to a higher level, the old, vulgar brawl will simply assume enlarged proportions. Woman has certainly as much right to be personal as man—and no more. But we shall cease to expect any particular "purification" from her influence, unless she puts it to better use than feeding grudges or nailing the ears of her enemies to her own door-post.

Rev. Mr. Hepworth is very frank. He says:—

"The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the one machine that is to do our work."

It is said that last summer Mr. Hepworth rescued a man from drowning, which was "work" we sincerely respect. He may well be proud of it. To-day he has another chivalrous job on hand. The world is "vilifying and calumniating the Unitarian denomination,"—in fact, burning it at the very stake. His "work" now is to put out that fire. Accordingly he again flies to the rescue, eager to "run with the machine" above mentioned, or (by implication) with any other that will do as well.

"EVER-PRESENT, potent, vigilant, in the breast of man," says Alcott, "there is that which never became a party in his guilt, never consented to a wrong deed, nor performed one; but holds itself above all sin, impeccable, immaculate, immutable, the deity of the heart, the conscience of the soul, the oracle and interpreter, the judge and the executor of the divine law."

SAADI, the Persian poet, has the following:—"A king said to a holy man, 'Are you ever thinking of me?' 'Yes,' said he, 'at such times as I am forgetting God Almighty.'"

"THE virtue of Paganism," says Hare, "was strength; the virtue of Christianity is obedience."

The yearly subscription price of the Chicago Present Age is $2.00, and not $3.00, as we erroneously stated a while ago. So much the greater inducement to subscribe.

CONSCIENCE AND CAUSATION AGAIN.

TIPECANOE CITY, O., Oct. 15, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—Verging three score and ten, I have no taste for controversy for its own sake; but I have a taste for truth, and like to exchange ideas on almost any subject for truth's sake. If I understand correctly, you regard physical and moral law as separate and distinct in their nature. I regard all law as a unit, whether we call them laws of God, nature, or man,—physical, intellectual, or moral. I look to the workings of my own mind, and I find I have no knowledge of things intellectual or moral except as they connect themselves with the physical; and my idealism is too weak to conceive of anything thus disconnected. I can no more do it than conceive what nothing is! I regard the mind of man, then, as having a tangible, physical basis. If this is so, then every faculty or law of the mind must have a like basis. Therefore I think there is no distinction between physical and moral law to the extent of the "alternatives" you make. In your conclusion you admit you may be mistaken: I will admit I may be, but I can't see how. Your strong ground in favor of freedom is: "there is that (we call it conscience) within a man which approves or condemns his good or bad actions; and this could not be so, if he was not free to do either the good or the bad; for he could not feel condemned for what he could not help." I take issue. The Christian system of morals, and our laws, too, inquire into, condemn, and punish according to the intentions of the offender. Now I suppose you will not say a man can help or prevent the feelings within him which prompt to do wrong. Have not all feelings and intentions a "necessary cause?" Mind, your conscience by its twinges condemns and punishes all such feelings and promptings; and so do our laws. This is a wise provision in nature, to have the first dawnings of wrong, or bad intentions, tipped in the bud (although I think all will admit such feelings cannot be prevented by the man who feels them), and punished by the twinges of conscience in order to prevent them from going further. Our laws will punish an evil act which we call accidental; they search for the feelings which prompted the act, and if they find them not evil, no punishment follows. Thus we see man is daily punished by conscience and laws for feelings he can by no means prevent. Our laws take the overt act of the offender only as proof of his feelings, and condemn or acquit accordingly. I should like to elucidate this subject further, but know your paper is small.

E. L. CRANE.

[We do not suppose Mr. Crane means that there is only one law in the universe to govern all classes of phenomena; yet unless he does, we see no relevancy in his objection that "all law is a unit." We believe that physical laws govern physical phenomena and moral laws govern moral phenomena; and that the unity of law consists in the perfect harmony which makes the infinitely various laws of Nature an intelligible system. Every other science has its own peculiar laws, and so has moral science.

Neither conscience nor society punishes "feelings" over which man has no control; and for this reason never punishes maniacs at all. On Mr. Crane's theory, ought they not either to treat maniacs as criminals, or criminals as maniacs?—ED.]

A GERMAN LIBERAL ON THE WAR.

BABYLON, LONG ISLAND, Oct. 13, 1870.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Friend,—The article entitled—"The War from a German Standpoint"—seems to emanate from ideas similar to those of Rev. Mr. Williams' sermon on "Observance of the Sabbath," in which the "home-born" enjoyed a monopoly of rights. Hans Breitmenn says:—"Only the Deutschers have the original ideas."

With all due respect for Mr. C. Weber's love for our good German nation, I must disagree with him, when he holds national notions above individual liberty. He seems to confound the two nations with the two men, Napoleon and Wilhelm, certainly not the best men out of those two great nations. The war commenced with these two. Not only the French army, but both armies, had to follow their leaders like a flock of sheep. My German brother says:—"Germany is neither fighting for monarchical nor republican principles; she is simply carrying out the defence of her home and her rights against the desire of a robber nation." I should be glad to agree with him, if he would say, not Germany, but a part of Germany. Only a part of her people were driven from their firesides to hunt the fox, Napoleon. Now that the fox is caged, the monarch who is full of that conceit of the "grace of God" forces his troops to devastate the country where the fox lived. As to "robber nation," I am quite confident that, if my German brother were a French citizen, and lived in the invaded country, he would be very likely to call the Germans a "robber nation" too. Do not blame the French, if they do so now.

Does my liberal friend sympathize with him who had to run away from Berlin in 1848? The people, who gasped for a liberal government, drove him out. Will this same King William refrain from interfering with a liberal government in France? I would rather trust the men who are now struggling to maintain a liberal government there, and whose watchword is—"Give us liberty, or give us death!"—than a King who had his own countrymen slaughtered in the streets of Berlin because they asked for a liberal government. Their history is a better guarantee than his. Oh, that he and his able minister, Bismarck, might be inspired with the modesty and goodness of a Washington! They would assist the French to form a liberal government. This kindness would be a better defence than all their castles and fortresses; and, instead of having the hatred of a great nation, they would have the love of all the civilized nations of the world! "Germany's mastery is the peace of Europe"! If France is conquered, may there not be a war between Prussia and Austria or Russia? The prophecy of Mr. Weber seems to me as uncertain as English neutrality. If the people of all civilized nations get the mastery over their despots, aristocrats, and priestocrats, and liberty is once fairly established, then is it far more likely that Europe and the whole civilized world will indeed have peace!

Let us have free men and free women, and let every free nation help all other nations to freedom! Liberty first—and nationality second!

Yours very truly,

CARL H. HORSCH.

A TRANSLATION FROM HEINE.

BY "SUBSCRIBER."

"When we lie on our death-bed, we become very gentle and tender-hearted, and would willingly make peace with God and man. I confess I have scratched many and bitten many, and been no lamb. But since I have stood in need of God's mercy, I have made a truce with all my foes; many beautiful poems which were directed against very high and very low persons are for that reason excluded from my present collections.

Poems which contained in any degree personalities against Almighty God I have committed to the flames with the zeal of fear. It is better that the verses should burn than the versifier. Yes, I have made peace with the Creator as well as with the creature, to the great displeasure of my enlightened friends, who reproach me for my relapse into the "old superstition," as they are pleased to term my return to God. Others express themselves with still bitter intolerance. Atheism's convocation has pronounced its anathema over me, and there are certain fanatical priests of unbelief who would willingly place me on the rack to make me renounce my heterodoxy. Happily they have no instruments of torture at command, except their writings. But I will confess everything without torture. I have really returned to God, like the prodigal son, after feeding swine with the Hegelians for many years. The divine home-sickness came upon me, and drove me forth, through woods and vales, over the dizziest mountain pathways of dialectics. On my way I found the God of the Pantheists; but I could make nothing of him. This poor visionary creature is interwoven with, and grown into, the world. Indeed, he is almost imprisoned in it, and yawns at you, without voice, without power. To have will, one must have personality, and to manifest one's self, one must have elbow room.

In religion I admit my back-sliding; but I must expressly contradict the report that it has brought me to the bosom or the threshold of any church whatever. No, my religious convictions and belief have remained free from all ecclesiastical prejudice. No music of church bells has seduced me; no splendor of altar candles has dazzled me. I have toyed with no symbolism, nor have I altogether renounced my reason. I have abjured nothing, not even my Pagan gods, from whom it is true I have parted, but only in friendship and love."

KNOWLEDGE, NOT FAITH.

FRIEND ABBOT:—In exchanging thoughts with a friend at a distance from home, he says to me: "I have a paper called THE INDEX; you ought to read, if you are not reading it." On telling him I had never before heard of the paper, he gave me two numbers, Sept. 3 and 10, which I can truly say I am well pleased with. It is my present impression that it is the paper I have been earnestly and anxiously looking after for more than a quarter of a century. Before this I never have come in contact with a paper (and I have tried many of them) that would candidly investigate facts connected with religion, which manifestly is the business of this incarnate life; for it is evident that man is innately a religious being. When he gives free action to the faculties which constitute him a man, and enable him to soar high above impulsive life, that action will secure to him the highest attainable conditions of life, consequently unadulterated happiness. Man inherits from his original and legitimate parent reasoning and knowing faculties which enable him to come to logical conclusions, to a full knowledge of reliable facts. The facts which he has not an intuitive knowledge of he may learn by scientific demonstrations; consequently our course of conduct should be governed by knowledge and not by faith. It is a sentiment which has by some means found its way into the Bible, that it belongs to us as rational beings to "prove all things and hold fast that which is good," and to throw away the bad. I fully indorse that sentiment, therefore do not feel authorized to believe anything in the Bible or out of it without the best of authority for doing so. It is evidently the case that mankind very much need to exchange the enormous amount of delusive fiction which we have got treasured up for reliable facts, which would entirely revolutionize the condition of the world. It would be exchanging hell for heaven; for hell is based on fictions and sophistry, and heaven has for its basis truths and facts. It is a practical knowledge of facts which secures heaven, and it is a practical ignorance of facts which ensures hell. The great and truthful saying of Pope has long since passed into immortal axiom, that "the proper study of mankind is man." Of all the studies that come within the range of thought, the study of man is by far the most important. For when we learn what man is, what he is composed of, from whence his composition is derived, then we may know for what employment he is adapted, and what the results of that employment will be. When we obtain a thorough knowledge of what man is, then the question asked by Geo. B. Gill on the fifth page of THE INDEX of Sept. 10, which is—"Who and what is God?"—may be satisfactorily answered. The testimony appears to be decisive that man, as a moral and intellectual being, is by transmission, and not by mechanism, a child of God. If man is the offspring of God, he is really and legitimately in the nature of things a miniature God, in all respects like his true parent. There is no other source from which the reasoning and knowing faculties of man could originate but from the great and only fountain of reason and knowledge.

INSPIRATION NOT SUPERNATURAL.

The understanding has to be disabused of the supernatural idea before it can appreciate the fact of inspiration as an influx to the soul from surrounding influences. That "God is in the human soul," is a grand and ennobling thought, which in itself is an inspiration drawn from the external relation of things. This does not, however, prevent or ignore the fact that He is in the human body, too, in its brains and even in its bones; that He is in every object of nature as well, in all that is in the air, or earth, or sky. But He is in the human soul in a higher sense than in anything else beside; and in proportion as that is elevated in thought, in emotion, and moral action, is the Divine presence realized there,—possibly, in a moral sense, to the extent of making it "the express image of God." It follows that, as we are conformed to the image of God, we shall be inspired by His presence; and as all truth is of God, and all truth is also of nature, to be inspired is to be impressed with the truth, whether we say it is of God or of nature. Whatever of truth, therefore, the Bible or any other book may contain, just so far it is inspiration; and there is no criterion by which to judge of revealed truth but by the soul itself, and every soul for itself, acting as umpire by the test of the inspiration of its own nature.

As has been stated, God is in all things; neither is there any animal or plant or mineral form or minutest atom, but is dependent on and formed by power acting through law—the power and law of God. He inspires or breathes into all existences life, instinct, or thought; for wherever the power of His spirit operates, there is His presence and inspiration. Without this there would be neither form nor life, nor conscious knowledge. He inspired man once when He endowed him with life; as it is said, "He breathed into him the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Since then he has been upheld and sustained by the same power; yet he had no more inspiration to begin with than he has had imparted to him every moment of his existence.

"In the beginning," it is said, "the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters,"—upon chaos,—and brought order out of confusion, harmony out of discord, good out of evil. But this is what the spirit of God is doing to-day, and what it has been doing continually from the beginning; if any of us can form a conception of such a phenomenon as "the beginning." Such is the creative energy of Nature, without which not a flower could bloom, or an animal exist for an instant. This activity of nature, continually creating, preserving and developing, is marvellous and incomprehensible; but it is as real, and can be appreciated by the mind as well, as any of the objects of sense. We are said to be "fearfully and wonderfully made." But we are not miraculously made, however wonderful may be the process; for Nature works no miracles—does nothing that is supernatural. No matter how unaccountable she may be in her operations, or how awe-inspiring in the magnificence and variety of her works, uniformity and law attend all her movements and influences.

The powers of Nature, or its hidden influences, are the powers of God or His inspiring presence; and though He works unseen, He is none the less demonstrable in the effects. He inspires the animal instinctively to propagate its species, and to select its appropriate food; but beyond the line of its own preservation, it has no consciousness or knowledge. He inspires the soul of man with thought, as he is inspired with life and all the functions of his organism. "For in Him we live, and move, and have our being." All our surroundings, circumstances, or conditions of life tend to influence our thoughts, or to inspire the soul; so that whether by unseen or apparent means there are no miraculous or supernatural inspirations—no Christing, anointing, or imbuwith the Holy Ghost, either as a person of the "Sacred Trinity," or as the effluence of the "Divine Unity," apart from man's nature or his soul's appropriate functions. For no such effluence ever emanates from God but through the established laws of life, of thought, and of the soul. The latter is as much the subject of law as is the motion of the heart and lungs, or as is the instinct of the animal that directs it in the line of its own preservation. Everything in its order—to which the normal inspiration of the soul is no exception, but is a law peculiar to itself, as all the laws of instinct are peculiar and appropriate to their specific end.

There can be no doubt but that there was design in the nature we inherit, though that nature has been attained through a long chain of conditions, and a gradual development and change from a crude state to that which it now presents, and which may be further and indefinitely improved by our own efforts and new conditions. But it is not to be supposed that, by this improvement of our being, the former man is to be repudiated, or that he shall be created anew, be born again, and take a new start; as though the race of Adam was an abortion, and a failure of the first design of its author. This must needs be the case, if the soul were supernaturally acted upon and transformed from its normal condition by the inspiring power of God; or, as it is written, were "created anew in Christ Jesus."

God being by nature in the soul, and in a special degree to the extent of its intelligence, goodness and purity, what need is there for His miraculously descending from His throne of universal law, and coming into it by the forestalling process of extra-inspiration, when He is already there, and has been in it from its inception? And what need is there for an extra-revelation of His will, when that will is already "written in the heart," and the light of Nature—"the inner light"—shines abundantly in the depths of every soul according to its needs?

SAN JOSE, CAL., Oct. 1, 1870.

THEORY OF IMMORTALITY:

OR A CONDENSED STATEMENT OF THE FORM OF CONTINUOUS HUMAN EXISTENCE.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:—The following views of Man's Future Life are the product of much thought, resulting in a profound conviction of their truth.

Humanity is spiritually one: that is, considered with reference to its physical part, it is a single, though complex, being. One universal life pervades it, or, more accurately, one universal life pervades the whole organized system of our globe, of which humanity is the predominant and most important portion. Life, developed into its higher forms, is associated with consciousness and mentality, and becomes what we term soul. Hence all terrestrial things, so far as living and conscious, are pervaded or animated by one and the same UNIVERSAL SOUL.

Our present lives are, therefore, bound to our future, and equally also to our past lives—or rather, all our successive lives are bound together by this Universal Soul, which may also, not inappropriately, be called the Collective Soul of our planet. It is nothing else than the collective life (in animals, innervation or nerve-force) which vitalizes or vivifies our whole planetary organic system. This Universal Soul, of which each individual Soul is a component part, (detached and individualized probably by the corporeal organization), is always the same; that is, continues always identical with itself throughout all the successive generations of men and animals, in the same sense as that in which the individual soul is understood to continue identical with itself through the different stages of growth, maturity and decline, incident to the physical organism. In other words, the one Universal Life flows on, so to speak, in an unchanging stream from generation to generation, but is subject, as each individual life is, to successive phases of development, through one of the earliest of which it is now passing. Chief and predominant only, but not exclusive, is the human element of the Universal Soul, which is not limited to human consciousness and mentality, but embraces also all animal instincts and sensations. By way of illustration, it may be said that the Universal Soul is made up of the manifold individual souls of all sensitive and conscious beings, in the same manner as the human body is made up of manifold distinct cells, each of which has, in an intelligible sense, an independent life of its own; and there is, beyond all reasonable doubt, a real parallelism, or veritable analogy, between these two cases in respect to the relation of each whole to its elements, that is, in respect to the manner in which each is severally constituted of its component parts, as herein indicated. The passing away of those who die, and the advent of those who are born, corresponds also to a process of waste and renovation which is all the time going on in the cellular tissue of which our bodies are composed.

So long, therefore, as our planet endures in a habitable state (for its life, we may presume, is not endless, but is probably made up of a limited series of phases corresponding to those through which individual man passes from the cradle to the grave), it will be man's only abiding place, his only sphere of activity and life; and no future existence awaits him except that which consists in his living, here on earth, successive human lives as a part of the great Universal Soul, which, though its elements are constantly passing through the transitions of births and deaths, flows on from age to age substantially the same.

Thus far the theory of a future state appears to me, in all its leading features, to be free from doubt, though not, in some of its outlines, free from obscurity, and therefore perhaps not from inaccuracy. The following additional statement rests upon probabilities so strong as to be, in my view, nearly equivalent to demonstration.

Man will never become conscious of his perpetual existence, or of his identity in the future with what he is now, without the aid of other than the individual faculties with which he is at present endowed. His individual memory cannot penetrate backward beyond his birth. It is quite possible, indeed, that no such identity exists as he has been taught to anticipate and is predisposed to expect; though of the perpetuity of his existence in some form, and in a form which, when fully revealed, will be felt to be the best and most satisfactory possible, there is no shadow of doubt. But under whatever form personal identity may be preserved, man can, in the future, feel and recognize it only by acquiring the power of using the consciousness or faculty of the Universal Soul. This will be effected, as I interpret the law of progress, by means of UNIVERSAL ASSOCIATION; that is, by uniting the whole human family in one harmonious brotherhood, and associating all together and each with each, in such manner as to form a co-operative organism, of which the several parts shall concur, without collision or discord, to promote the welfare of each other and of the whole. This Universal Association I regard as the certain destiny of Humanity, and when it is established, each individual man will become a partaker of the consciousness of the Universal Soul, and will be enabled to avail himself of its memory, and thus to appropriate to himself its past experience, and by this means to recognize the part, whatever it may have been, which he has acted as a participator in its complex functions. This recognition of past careers will result, therefore, from his collective life, when he shall become fraternally associated with all his fellow-men; and, until this grand consummation, he will continue oblivious, as he now is, of his former lives, nor, until then, will he be able, in any way, to feel that his passing career is but a new phase of his indestructible existence.

NOTE.—Though this theory is suggested by other facts than the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, and depends upon a very different order of proofs, yet I am inclined to interpret many of these phenomena as tending directly to confirm it. The apparently superhuman intelligence manifested, at times, by so-called mediums (as also in many other cases equally well authenticated), as when revelations are made of facts, afterwards fully verified, for the knowledge of which no recognized physiological or psychological laws will account, appears to me to be most rationally explained by assuming these extraordinary revelations to result from the incipient and imperfect commingling, if I may use that term, of the individual with the collective consciousness. It is probably the embryonic stage of some hitherto unsuspected method of physical intercommunication. At the same time, the feeble hold of the individual upon the collective consciousness, in connection with the rudimentary and undeveloped state of the collective functions, furnishes the best explanation, perhaps, of the incoherent and deceitful character of many of the communications, as also of the fact that none of them have any tendency to enlarge the field of human knowledge.

E. P. GRANT.

CANTON, O., Oct. 10, 1870.

MASTER AND SLAVE.—We have learned, on what we suppose to be good authority, that at a recent consecration of a church in a neighboring Diocese, the following incident occurred. A venerable presbyter took the service at the Creed, but instead of standing at the Reading Desk, stood with his back to the congregation and facing the Communion Table. The Bishop said in a clearly audible voice: "Dr. — will read the Creed facing the congregation." No attention, however, was paid to this motion, and Dr. — commenced the prayers facing in the same direction. The Bishop then said in a louder tone: "Dr. — will read the prayers facing the congregation." The suppressed excitement at this point was intense. The Doctor continued in the same position. The Bishop then exclaimed: "Dr. — will read the prayers facing the congregation. I command obedience." This time the firmness and decision of the Bishop had its effect. Dr. — rose meekly, went to the Reading Desk, and there continued the service.

We cannot but sympathize with the Bishop's dislike of such vagaries in the performance of divine service, but we may well question the wisdom of such a method of arresting them. This suppression of Dr. — proceeds upon the supposition that the Bishop has absolute authority in such a matter. But, unfortunately, there are Bishops whose dislike takes exactly the opposite direction. Are we ready to admit that any Bishop is possessed of such authority that if he should say, "Dr. — will read the Creed facing the Altar, I command obedience," he should be compelled to obey? In such cases it is very apt to make a good deal of difference "whose ox is gored."—Prot. Churchman.

[Nobody's ox will be gored, when the world gets well rid of all its Episcopal bulls. What are they for, if not to use their horns?—Ed.]

ALL IN FUN.—At a Baptist church in the Western part of this State, a few weeks since, a girl of a shy disposition about to be immersed very naturally resisted the attempts of the minister to lead her into the water, and after a short struggle began to sob and cry with great violence. At this moment, while a crowd of spectators were anxiously watching the result, a younger brother of the girl stepped up to her and exclaimed, in an under-tone—"Don't be scared, Sal, they're only in fun!"—Weekly Business, (Hillsdale, Mich.)

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE WESTERN CONVENTIONS.

At the date of this paper two of our proposed Conventions will have been held; those at Cincinnati and Indianapolis. Next week we shall give such account of the Cincinnati Convention as our space will allow, and, in following issues, of the others in order.

The Convention at Toledo is to begin on Monday evening, the 7th instant, and hold through Tuesday, the 8th. It will be attended by the President and Secretary of the Association, and Rabbi Wise, Messrs. Abbot, Vickers, Connor, Towne, Giles B. Stebbins, and other well-known speakers. We have also a hope, and there is a good probability of its being realized, that the venerable Lucretia Mott will be present. In any event we expect to have at Toledo a good Convention—a worthy crown of the series. Let there be a strong rally, not only from the city itself, but from Northern Ohio and Southern Michigan.

WHO ORGANIZED US?

We have heard the question asked, Where did the free religious movement begin and who started it? Some people in the West are asking it now, in view of our Western Conventions; which have first brought the subject to their attention. When the question is put in this form, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give it an answer. There seems always to have been a free religious movement in the world. Wherever there has been a protest and rebellion against existing ecclesiastical authority, wherever there has been assertion of the right of man to think and act for himself in religious matters, there has been a movement in behalf of religious freedom; a movement toward free religion for the time being, even though the assertion and the protest have ultimately developed a new standard of ecclesiastical authority. Thus Buddhism in relation to the more ancient authority and creed of Brahmanism, Christianity in its relation to the existing Judaism, Mohammedanism in its relation to the mongrel dogmatic Christianity of Arabia in the seventh century, Protestantism in relation to Catholicism, Liberal Christianity in relation to Calvinism,—these have all been movements in the interest of religious freedom. Moses, Jesus, Paul, Socrates, Sakya Mouni, Isaiah, Luther, Robinson, Fox, Channing, Parker,—these men have all in their different ways and times been promoters of free religion, because they all emancipated themselves from the authority of surrounding faiths; though upon their work new structures of dogmatic or ecclesiastical authority have generally been erected. In a sense, therefore, the free religious movement is very old and very wide-spread, and may be said to have its source in the native intelligence and conscience of the human mind itself, asserting their right to represent the ultimate rule of belief and practice for man.

But the question has reference to this modern movement which has taken shape in the Free Religious Association. Yet here, also, a distinction must be made. Even this modern movement is older than the Association. The Association simply came to represent and express, as best it could, something that was already in existence. The movement organized us rather than we it. The Free Religious Association, so far from starting the movement, was itself originated and formed by the movement, and still has its impulse from it. There were people in the limits of Christendom who had become dissatisfied with all forms of sectarian faith. Some of them, perhaps, were still in the sects nominally, others had openly left the sects. Some of them were entirely emancipated from ecclesiastical authority, others were only seeking emancipation. But all were alike moved by the spirit of freedom. And this was not only in free America, but in England, in Germany, in Switzerland, in Italy, in Protestantism and Catholicism. And the same facts were apparent in other great religions,—in Judaism, in Hinduism, and other of the Oriental faiths. These facts seemed to have a common basis, to be parts of one general impulse. There appeared to be a movement, not in Christendom alone, but in other faiths, off the ground of authoritative and specific external Revelation, and towards a standard of truth and duty to be found in the human soul itself and belonging to universal humanity. These people of the different sects and religions, though far apart and travelling by very different paths, seemed to be aiming at the same thing. They were converging towards a common centre. Their creeds and methods might still be various, but they were evidently beginning to feel the attraction of a higher fellowship than that of belief or ritual. Even though still unconscious of each other's approach, they were coming into unity of spirit. They were advancing to a basis of practical co-operation on the ground of equality of human brotherhood,—already seeing that their several great leaders and prophets, the Isaiahs, the Christs, the Buddhas, the Socrates, the Luthers, were alike brothers to one another and workers together for the whole family of mankind. It was out of the consciousness of this movement that the Free Religious Association came.

Of course personal agency was necessary to organization. Some of us who felt ourselves in the free current, felt also that the time had come to give some visible, tangible form to the fellowship that was already a vital reality. Yet those to whose lot it has fallen to be most active in originating and sustaining the organization, do not presume for a moment to think that the whole movement has been organized in their hands. They strive to give expression to all parts of the movement as well as they are able. But they know full well that there are many persons who are as much in the movement as themselves who are not members of the Association, and who have even looked upon any organization with suspicion, as of dangerous tendency; that there are many, too, in the movement, in this country and all parts of the world, who have never heard of the existence of the Association. They do not belittle the movement so much as to suppose that it is measured by the activity of the Association, or that it is dependent upon their personal agency. All that they would claim is that the aim of their organization is comprehensive and noble; that it is meant to be representative of the entire movement and elastic to its demands. Rev. Mr. Towne, in his Examiner, refers by name to certain persons, himself one of them, who were specially interested and active in setting the new organization on foot. We know, however, that he and they would agree that it is of little importance to the movement that their personal instrumentality in it should be distinguished. And, by the way, Mr. Towne mistakes, when he implies that the Association owes its origin to a suggestion of his which resulted in the informal meeting at which the project was first discussed. As explained in the first number of THE INDEX, the occasion for forming the Association was given by the action of the National Unitarian Conference of 1866, in refusing to broaden its basis of fellowship. The idea of a new Association on a perfectly free basis seems to have presented itself independently to several persons who were in the defeated minority, before they reached their homes. We know that one member of that Conference, before its sessions closed, conceived the plan of an organization very nearly as it has been carried out, and related it to a friend. The informal meeting in Boston to which Mr. Towne alludes gave a good opportunity for broaching the project, and for bringing together by a comparison of views those who had come by separate paths to the same idea. But the project would doubtless have found the light in some way, if that meeting had not been held. This statement is important only as showing that the Association originated, not so much in any one person's thought, as in a common spirit, manifesting itself independently in a number of minds.

And a movement towards organization having once been made, the wide capacity of the movement was rapidly developed. It soon passed beyond its incidental and provincial birth-place to enter upon a much larger than sectarian career. It gathered adherents from various sects and non-sects of Christendom. It sent an appeal to Judaism, and received a cordial fraternal response. It stretched out its hand across the Atlantic and Western hemisphere, and it was grasped by brother hands, warm with the same desire, in Hindustan. And to-day it stands for a spiritual fellowship as wide as the world, and based on natural human aspirations to know the truth and to do the right.

Who organized us? Should we be far from right if we answered,—“The spirit that first moved upon chaos and shaped it into worlds, and that still lives and moves and has its being as vital Force in the world of man.”

TRACTS.

A new thing under the sun! We have recently met with a series of rationalistic religious Tracts. They are entitled, “The Church and the World;” “I am an Honest Man;” “The Bible Vindicated;” “The Wisdom of Jesus;” “God's Justice and Mercy;” “Infallibility;” “Radicalism;” “Prayer;”

“Learn by Experience;” “What becomes of Sin?” “Fulton on Dickens;” “Love to God;” “The Negative Party in Religion;” “The Truth shall make you Free.” These tracts, which are thoroughly rationalistic and radical in their theology, are among the religious signs of the times. They are written reverently, but with incisive logic; and are designed especially to exhibit in a popular way the fallacy of the popular claims of Orthodoxy. They appear without the name of either writer or publisher. Not even do they wear the name of “Boston” upon them. We have nevertheless discovered their secret, and shall be glad to put any persons who may desire them in the way of obtaining them. They will be given away. At the same time any persons who may wish to aid in printing them, and others of the same family that are promised, can do so by paying a small price. Ten cents for five; twenty-five cents for all. They may be obtained by applying through the Secretary of the Free Religious Association, New Bedford, Mass.

ERRATUM.—In THE INDEX for Oct. 8, in the article signed “T. W. H.,” third sentence of fourth paragraph, for “doxy” read “theology.”

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on “The Idea of the Free Religious Association;” DAVID A. WASSON, on “The Nature of Religion;” MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on “Religion as a Social Force;” F. E. ABBOT, on “The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;” S. JOHNSON, on “The Natural Sympathy of Religions;” RABBI WISE, on “The Universal Elements in Judaism;” COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on “Mohammedanism;” WM. H. CHANNING, on “The Religions of China;” W. J. POTTER, on “The Religions of India;” and an abstract of a discussion on the “Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States.” This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on “THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA,” (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on “THE WORSHIP OF JESUS” (50 cents), and an essay on “REASON AND REVELATION,” by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1863 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the “Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj;” also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on “Religion and Social Science;” a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on “Religious Movements in England;” and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

BIBLE MANUSCRIPTS.—Most of our readers are aware that the originals of the Books of Scripture are not now in existence. Copies in manuscript, technically termed codices, are all that we have now to depend on. The earliest codices of the Old Testament extant, are the Spanish. They may be attributed to the ninth and tenth centuries, and are held in high esteem by the Jews, as it is asserted that they were corrected by the Codex Hillel, a manuscript supposed to have been of hoary antiquity. Nevertheless, the Hebrew scholar has often wished, from the bottom of his heart, that a copy of the ancient Scriptures might be found, which belonged to the halcyon days of the sacred tongue, when every king was commanded to write him a copy of the law in a book.—Appleton's Journal.

Archdeacon Dennison, fighting bravely for Sunday cricket, has found an unexpected ally. A brother of Lord Lyttleton writes to the Guardian that, when John Knox called on Calvin at Geneva, one Sunday afternoon, he found him playing a game of bowls—say nine-pins—and it is not recorded that he found fault with him for so doing. Now if John Knox and John Calvin could play a game of nine-pins on a Sunday afternoon, why should not modern Calvinists play base ball or cricket? The question is rather a poser to those who believe in the infallibility of Knox and Calvin.

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

[The Seventh Free Lecture delivered in City Hall, Dover, N. H., Jan. 30, 1869. Reprinted from The Radical for January, 1870.]

Before Rome had become mistress of the world, four great empires were known to the Jews,—the Babylonian or Chaldean, the Median, the Persian, and the Grecian. Of these, the first dates from pre-historic times, and had for its capital city Babylon, which is said to have included within its walls a district five times as large as London. From B. C. 747, down to the time of Nabonadius or Nabonidus, its last monarch, there is an authentic list of the kings of the Chaldean Empire. The second or Median Empire, which became independent of Chaldeæ about B. C. 700, flourished until it was conquered by the great Cyrus, B. C. 558, who founded the third or Persian Empire by the capture of Babylon about twenty years later. Persia remained the supreme power in Asia until B. C. 330, when Alexander the Great subdued it, and established the fourth or Grecian Empire. Thus four great empires rose in succession on each other's ruins,—Chaldeæ, Media, Persia, and Greece. But the vast Greek Empire founded by Alexander fell to pieces at his death, and became subdivided into four smaller empires; namely, Macedonia, Asia, Syria, and Egypt. Of these, Syria fell to the lot of Seleucus, one of Alexander's generals, and founder of the royal dynasty of the Seleucidæ, who reigned until Syria was annexed to the Roman Empire. The eleventh king of this family was Antiochus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the Great, who came to the throne at the expense of three other kings. His brother, Seleucus IV., had been poisoned by Heliodorus, one of his own officers; and the rightful son and heir of Seleucus, Demetrius, being a mere boy, and held at the time as a hostage in Rome, Antiochus Epiphanes seized his opportunity, and obtained the Syrian crown by wresting it from the assassin and usurper, Heliodorus. Thus, in the year B. C. 175, Antiochus Epiphanes, profiting by the misfortunes of Seleucus IV., Demetrius, and Heliodorus, became king of Syria,—an event never to be forgotten by any Jew, nor yet to be remembered without horror. A fiercer or more cruel persecution never befell any people than that with which Antiochus Epiphanes pursued the wretched Jews. Before I give any account of this, or explain its connection with my subject, let us glance at a few facts of Hebrew history, a remembrance of which is essential to my purpose.

About six hundred years before Christ, Nebuchadnezzar, the most famous king of Chaldeæ, had carried off to Babylon, as captives, vast numbers of conquered Jews. All of these who retained love for their country and their national religion pined for the privilege of return; and, after an exile of about seventy years, some forty thousand of them obtained a decree from Cyrus the Persian, who had just conquered Babylon, permitting them to go home and rebuild Jerusalem. The feelings of these Jews, returning to the sufferings of their long exile, are expressed in a well-known Psalm [CXXXVII.], doubtless composed at the time by one of their number:—

"By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down and wept; yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the land. For there they that had carried us away captive required of us a song: they that wasted us required of us mirth. 'Sing unto us one of the songs of Zion.' How shall we sing Jehovah's song in a strange land? If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning! If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth! If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy! . . . O daughter of Babylon, thou destroyer! Happy be he who requiteth thee as thou hast dealt with us! Happy be he who taketh thy little ones, and dasheth them against the stones!"

Could the extremes of intense love and intense hatred be uttered in more burning words? Tender as a woman, yet savage as a tiger, was the heart which poured forth these passionate strains. Yet they must have simply embodied in words the emotions of every one of that returning band. Their miseries, however, were not yet over. Delays and discouragements, opposition from enemies, and misfortunes of various sorts, made the work of reconstruction slow indeed; but after many years the temple and the city were rebuilt. It is impossible for me here to trace the history of the colony: it led a precarious existence for centuries, but gradually increased in population and strength. After the death of Alexander the Great, Judæa was trampled under foot in the wars between the Seleucidæ of Syria and the Ptolemies of Egypt, lying as it did between the contending powers, and becoming alternately the prey of each. The father and brother of Antiochus Epiphanes, who preceded him on the throne, had in the main treated the Jews with kindness; but when, in the year B. C. 175, this monster became king, a storm began to gather over their heads, which soon burst forth with frightful violence. Hellenistic culture had made a deep impression on the Jewish nation, and many Jews had begun to imitate Greek customs and adopt the Greek religion; while the patriotic and pious Jews had imbibed the intensest hatred of both. Tumults arose between the two parties; and Antiochus, seizing these as a pretext, in the year B. C. 170, entered Jerusalem, massacred the inhabitants by thousands, with his own hand robbed the temple of its golden vessels, plundered it of a vast amount of sacred treasures, and carried away with him a large train of captives. Two years later, he sent an army under Apollonius, which, waiting until the Sabbath, made another dreadful slaughter of the Jews while engaged at their devotions. Antiochus then issued an edict to compel heathen worship throughout all his dominions, had the Jewish temple dedicated to the Greek god Zeus, set up the worship of idols in its holy places, erected an altar to Zeus on the brazen altar of Jehovah, and caused pig's flesh to be sacrificed upon it, while pig's broth was sprinkled about the temple on purpose to outrage and shock the feelings of the nation by defiling their sanctuary. Nor was this all. He not only forbade the Jews to observe the Sabbath, and to practise their own rites of sacrifice and circumcision, but even compelled them to take part in all these foreign abominations. To give some idea of the unspeakable cruelty of Antiochus Epiphanes, and of the heroic endurance of the Jews, let me quote some passages from the second Book of Maccabees, which describes them at length.

"For there were two women brought, who had circumcised their children; whom when they had openly led round about the city, the babes hanging at their breasts, they cast them down headlong from the walls. And others that had run together into caves near by, to keep the Sabbath day secretly, being discovered to Philip, were all burnt together, because they made scruple of helping themselves for the honor of the most sacred day." [vi. 10-11.]

"Eleazer, one of the principal scribes, an aged man, and of a well-favored countenance, was constrained to open his mouth, and eat swine's flesh. But he, choosing rather to die gloriously than to live stained with such an abomination, spit it forth, and came of his own accord to the torment. . . . But they that had charge of that wicked feast, for the old acquaintance they had with the man, taking him aside, besought him to bring flesh of his own provision, such as was lawful for him to eat, and make as if he did eat of the flesh taken from the sacrifice commanded by the king. But he . . . answered, . . . 'It becometh not our age in any wise to dissemble, whereby many young persons might think that Eleazer, being fourscore years old and ten, were now gone to a strange religion. And so they through mine hypocrisy, and desire to live a little time and a moment longer, should be deceived by me, and I get a stain to mine old age, and make it abominable. . . . Wherefore, now, manfully changing this life, I will shew myself such an one as mine age requireth, and leave a notable example to such as be young, to die willingly and courageously for the honorable and holy laws.' . . . And thus this man died, leaving his death for an example of a noble courage and a memorial of virtue, not only unto young men, but to all his nation." [vi. 18-21.]

"It came to pass, also, that seven brethren, with their mother, were taken, and compelled by the king, against the law, to taste swine's flesh, and were tormented with scourges and whips. But one of them, that spake first, said thus:—'What wouldst thou ask or learn of us? we are ready to die, rather than transgress the laws of our fathers.' Then the king, being in a rage, commanded pans and caldrons to be made hot: which forthwith being heated, he commanded to cut out the tongue of him that spake first, and to cut off the utmost parts of his body, the rest of his brethren and his mother looking on. Now, when he was thus maimed in all his members, the king commanded him, being yet alive, to be brought to the fire, and to be fried in the pan; and as the vapor of the pan was for a good space dispersed, they exhorted one another with the mother to die manfully. . . . So, when the first was dead after this manner, they brought the second to make him a mocking-stock; and, when they had pulled off the skin of his head with his hair, they asked him, 'Wilt thou eat before thou be punished throughout every member of thy body?' But he answered in his own language, and said, 'No.' Wherefore he received the next torment in order, as the former did. [In this manner all the seven died courageously for their faith.] . . . But the mother was marvellous above all, and worthy of honorable memory; for, when she saw her seven sons slain in the space of one day, she bore it with good courage, because of the hope she had in the Lord. . . . Now Antiochus, thinking himself despised, . . . whilst the youngest was yet alive, did not only exhort him by words, but also assured him with oaths, that he would make him both a rich and a happy man if he would turn from the laws of his fathers; and that also he would take him for his friend, and trust him with affairs. But when the young man would in no case hearken unto him, the king called his mother, and exhorted her that she would counsel the young man to save his life. And when he had exhorted her with many words, she promised him that she would counsel her son. But she, bowing herself towards him, laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn, spake in her country language in this manner: 'O my son, have pity upon me that bare thee, . . . and gave thee suck three years, and nourished thee, and brought thee up unto this age, and endured the troubles of thy education. . . . Fear not this tormentor; but, being worthy of thy brethren, take thy death, that I may receive thee again in mercy with thy brethren.' While she was yet speaking these words, the young man said: 'Whom wait ye for? I will not obey the king's commandment; but I will obey the commandment of the law that was given unto our fathers by Moses.' . . . Then the king, being in a rage, handled him worse than all the rest, and took it grievously that he was mocked. So this man died undefiled, and put his whole trust in the Lord. Last of all, after the sons, the mother died." [viii.]

Without the insight into the spirit of that age which we obtain from these stories,—without a knowledge of the miseries inflicted upon the Jews by that wild beast, Antiochus, and the stern heroism with which the faithful portion of the people endured them in the hope of final deliverance,—it would be impossible to comprehend the Book of Daniel. The key to its prophecies is found in the history of that epoch. But the book is a unit, and any attempt to interpret it otherwise, or to explain one part of it without reference to the other parts, ends inevitably in total misapprehension of its meaning. The first thing to be done, therefore, is to take a bird's-eye view of the whole book before seeking to understand any particular part of it.

Now the twelve chapters of which the book is composed fall into two chief divisions, six chapters in each. The first half consists of what might be called historical parables; that is, stories, more or less apocryphal, concerning the hero of the book. The real object, however, is not to relate his history, but rather to foster in the reader's mind a spirit of devotion to the God of the Jews, and to inspire an intense faith in his power to save, to punish, and to reward. The second part consists of prophecies, or, more accurately speaking, of apocalyptic visions, describing in symbolical form the course of history, and showing how the four great Asiatic empires are to be followed by the universal Messianic empire destined by Jehovah for his chosen people. The first part serves thus as a fitting introduction to the second part; and both together constitute an artistic whole, evincing no small ability in the author of the book. Having thus indicated the general scope of it, let me now give a brief synopsis or summary of its contents.

Chapter first describes the education of four young Hebrew nobles, Daniel and his three companions, at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldean conqueror of Judæa; and shows how their fidelity to the Jewish law concerning food and drink is rewarded by God with health, wisdom, and great favor in the king's eyes.

Chapter second describes how Nebuchadnezzar, greatly troubled by a forgotten dream which his own wise men could neither divine nor interpret, receives from Daniel a full statement of the dream itself, and a complete interpretation of its meaning; and how the king, in consequence, acknowledges the Hebrew Jehovah as God of all gods, and makes Daniel "chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon." The dream itself belongs essentially to the second part of the book, and I will speak of it again in that connection; but this chapter aims to create faith in Daniel as a seer and interpreter, and thus predisposes to faith in his own subsequent visions.

Chapter third, apparently overlooking the king's conversion to faith in the Hebrew Jehovah, relates that he erected, in the plain of Dura, an enormous golden image, which he commands all to worship at a given signal, on pain of death. Daniel's three companions refuse to do this, and are cast into "a burning fiery furnace," from whose flames, however, they are miraculously saved by the angel of the Lord. The king is so amazed at their deliverance that he decrees death to any one who speaks disrespectfully of Jehovah. The lesson of this chapter is, that Jehovah will deliver his servants from all the wrath of man, and thus encourages a spirit of obedience to his law.

Chapter fourth relates another dream of Nebuchadnezzar, which Daniel again interprets, though the king's wise men were again in the dark. The dream, furthermore, was soon fulfilled. In punishment of his pride, the king is smitten by Jehovah with madness, driven into the fields, and compelled to eat grass like the oxen "for seven times" (i. e., seven years), until he learns that the Most High rules the kingdoms of men; and then he is restored to his throne. This chapter again exalts the greatness of Daniel as an interpreter of visions, and teaches the absolute control of Jehovah over all human empires.

Chapter fifth describes the feast of Belshazzar, who, in punishment for profaning with unclean touch the golden vessels of the Jewish temple, beholds his sentence written out by the awful hand on his palace wall. This, again, the wise men fail to comprehend, while Daniel expounds it. The same night Belshazzar is slain, and Babylon captured by the Medes. Here we have the same points emphasized,—Daniel's ability to interpret dreams, and Jehovah's judgment on wickedness in high places. The story acquires new significance when we remember that Antiochus Epiphanes, like Belshazzar, defiled the golden vessels of the temple by his profane touch and impious robbery; and every Jewish reader would at once make application of the story to his case.

Chapter sixth relates that Daniel, for his faithfulness to Jehovah, is cast into the den of lions, and saved miraculously from their jaws; while his enemies themselves met the fate they had designed for him.

On a review, therefore, of these six chapters of the first half of the book, we cannot fail to be struck with two things,—their exaltation of Daniel as a seer and expounder of visions, and their inculcation of the truth that the God of the Hebrews will save in the uttermost extremities all those who are faithful to the law of Moses. The one tends to create faith in the revelations that are to follow: the other tends to encourage the Jews under persecution to defy their oppressors, to persist in obedience to their national religion, and to look undauntedly to a great coming salvation from all their woes. This correspondence between the spirit of the book and the spirit of the age is altogether too striking to be accidental; and, when we examine the visions of the second part, we shall be still more deeply impressed by it. These I propose to examine now as briefly as I may.

Including the forgotten dream of Nebuchadnezzar mentioned in chapter second,—which, by its character, belongs really to the second division of the book,—we have the succession of the four great empires symbolized twice over in a perfectly unmistakable manner, even were the explanation not given by the book itself. The dream of the king was this. An immense image stood before him, with a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet partly iron and partly clay. But a "stone cut without hands" smote it on the feet until the whole crumbled and disappeared; and, becoming itself a great mountain, the stone then filled the whole earth. Here the head of gold is the Chaldean Empire, the breast and arms of silver the Median Empire, the belly and thighs of brass the Persian Empire, and the legs of iron the Grecian Empire. But the feet mixed with iron and clay represent the weakness of the Greek Empire after Alexander the Great had died, and the divisions which even royal alliances by marriage could not heal. The "stone cut without hands" is the Messianic kingdom of the Jews, to be established, not by human means, but by the power of God, and destined to embrace the whole world. Observe that this Messianic kingdom was to follow immediately the destruction of the feet of the image,—that is, the divided members of the Greek Empire; and, according to the vision, therefore, it ought to have taken the place of the Roman Empire, which, in actual fact, succeeded the Grecian.

Now chapter seventh repeats substantially, under the form of a vision seen by Daniel himself, the same thought. Four great beasts came up from the sea, one after the other. The first was a lion with eagle's wings; i. e., the Chaldean Empire. The third was a leopard with four heads; i. e., the Persian Empire with the four kings mentioned in Ezra iv. 5-7,—namely, Cyrus, Darius, Ahasuerus, and Artaxerxes. The fourth is a dreadful beast with iron teeth, stamping and devouring everything, with ten horns, among which at last arose another little horn, before which three of the first horns were plucked up by the roots; and this little horn had eyes like those of a man, and a mouth speaking great things. This fourth beast is the Greek Empire of Alexander, its ten horns the first ten Syrian kings, and the little horn, before which three of the first horns perished, is the eleventh king, Antiochus Epiphanes, who obtained the throne at the expense of Seleucus IV., Heliodorus, and Demetrius. But now thrones are placed, an aged person (or, as our common version renders it, the "Ancient of Days," i. e., Jehovah) seats himself, and begins the great judgment which is to introduce the Messianic kingdom. The four beasts are all destroyed; and then "one like a son of man" comes with the clouds of heaven, and is brought to Jehovah, who bestows upon him dominion and glory and an everlasting kingdom.

A very interesting question arises here, whether this "one like a son of man" is the Messiah himself, or a symbolic representation of the Messianic kingdom. After much study, I conclude in favor of the latter interpretation. [See Dr. Noyes, Introduction to "Translation of the Hebrew Prophets," p. 37.] The four beasts all typify four kingdoms; but, instead of typifying the Messianic kingdom by a beast, the author typifies it by a man, in order to indicate its superior majesty and glory. This understanding of the vision is confirmed by the explanation given in the book to Daniel himself. Four times it is said, that, after the destruction of the fourth beast, the kingdom shall be given "to the saints of the Most High," while not one word is said about a Messiah or king of the saints. This is perfectly in harmony with the ancient Hebrew conception of the theocracy, or the kingdom in which God himself was king, while the saints were a commonwealth or ecclesiastical aristocracy under him. I cannot here go into details; although scholars disagree on the true meaning of the words, "one like a son of man," as used in this passage, the more thought I give to it, the more strongly I become convinced that they are a figure of speech, representing the kingdom of the saints under the image of a man, as the four heathen empires are represented under the image of as many beasts. Here, again, it is to be observed, that, in any interpretation, the advent of the Messianic kingdom immediately follows the destruction of the little horn of the fourth beast; that is, immediately succeeds the overthrow of Antiochus Epiphanes.

The third vision of the second part is as follows. Daniel beholds by the river Ulai a ram with two horns, of which one was higher than the other, and came up last. This is the Medo-Persian Empire regarded as one; the Medes being the smaller horn, and the Persians being the larger and later horn. While Daniel was beholding the ram pushing westward and northward and southward, a he-goat came out of the west "without touching the ground," i. e., with great rapidity, and bearing a conspicuous horn between its eyes. This he-goat is the Greek Empire, and his conspicuous horn is Alexander. The he-goat demolishes the ram, and breaks off his two horns; and none could deliver the ram from his power. Thus the he-goat becomes exceedingly great; but, when he was strongest, the great horn (i. e., Alexander) was broken, and instead of it there grew up four conspicuous horns (i. e., the four kingdoms of Macedonia, Asia, Syria, and Egypt). And out of one of them (Syria) there came a little horn (Antiochus Epiphanes), which wrought all manner of impieties and outrages. In his vision, Daniel heard one angel ask another how long these things should be; to which the first replied, "Two thousand and three hundred evenings and mornings," i. e., about three years and a half. Elsewhere the period is described as "a time and times and half a time," which means the same, or three years and a half; and this same period is several times assigned, in different modes of expression, as the term of the suspension of the temple service by Antiochus. At the command of God, the Angel Gabriel explains to Daniel in full the meaning of the vision.

The fourth vision comes to Daniel after he has been pondering over the saying of Jeremiah the prophet, that Jerusalem should remain in ruins seventy years. Gabriel appears in order to explain to him the meaning of this saying; but, although this vision is of great importance in helping to fix the true date of our book, its details would only weary, and I pass to the fifth or last vision.

By the banks of the river Tigris, the Angel Gabriel appears to Daniel, and goes into a very minute and very accurate account of the history of the Greek Empire, especially of its two offshoots, Syria and Egypt, down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. Under the names of "King of the North and King of the South," he describes the conflicts and varying fortunes of these two countries, in their connection with the fortunes of the chosen people. Now, immediately after the death of Antiochus, Michael, the guardian angel of the Jewish nation, shall deliver them in a time of unheard-of trouble; then comes immediately the resurrection and the Messianic kingdom. Daniel is commanded, as he has been commanded before, to seal up the prophecies until the time of the end, which has been fixed four distinct times for the period immediately succeeding the death of Antiochus. This took place B. C. 164. Down to this date, everything is sketched exactly and in detail as it actually happened: from that date, everything is cloudy and miraculous. History vanishes in the dawning glories of the Messianic reign; and then shall come the everlasting relief of the chosen people from all their miseries, the everlasting establishment of their empire over all the world.

Such, then, are the contents of this Book of Daniel. Its first half, by its brilliant and beautiful series of historical parables, paves the way for the mystical and consoling visions of its second half. The earlier division shows, that, despite their subjugation by the heathen empires, the chosen people have the special protection of the most-high God; while the latter division shows what a glorious destiny God holds in reserve for them, as soon as their sins have been burned away in the furnace of sorrow, and his own appointed season has arrived for vengeance on their foes. The aim of the book was to comfort and encourage the Jews under the fiery persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, and to sustain them by the revelation of the universal empire that should be conferred upon them by God immediately after the death of that savage tyrant in the year B. C. 164.

Now the common belief of the date, origin and purpose of the book are, that it was written by Daniel himself at Babylon, about six hundred years before Christ; and that its prophecies, being in part, at least, still unfulfilled, relate to the future end of the world, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the great "day of judgment," when all souls shall be admitted either into an everlasting heaven, or condemned to an everlasting hell. It is sufficient to say that these beliefs have no basis but superstition, and no defense but ignorance. No candid and unprejudiced scholar will now venture to advocate them. The facts are, as has been proved to the satisfaction of all independent students, that the Book of Daniel was composed by some unknown author, probably in Palestine, either just before or just after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, B. C. 164; that its predictions place the advent of the Messianic kingdom immediately after this event, and have no reference whatever, direct or indirect, to any events still future to us; that most of its pretended prophecies are really history under a false name; and that the rest of them were not and will not be fulfilled, inasmuch as the definitely fixed date of their fulfillment has long since passed away. Whether there ever was such a man as Daniel, is very problematical: the mention of him by the prophet Ezekiel is very suspicious, if applied to one of his own contemporaries; and it is quite certain, that, as history, the first half of our book is quite mythical. There may have been some slight basis for some of these stories; but that the facts, if facts they were, have been dressed up and colored for a definite purpose, scarcely admits of a doubt. In order to gain for it greater authority and credence, the whole book was attributed to a supposed prophet of the time of the captivity in Babylon; and, in order to explain to its readers why it had not been earlier known to the Jews, the author is careful to put into the mouth of Gabriel a command to "seal up" the prophecies till the "time of the end," that is, until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. The idea is thus suggested, that the book, although written four centuries previous, was concealed by divine command, and not brought forth until the fierce persecutions of Antiochus, and the near approach of the grand crisis, should make its contents a great encouragement to the oppressed people of God.

Although it is thus plain, that, in attributing his work to an ancient prophet of the captivity, the writer was guilty of what we should call, in plain English, a "forgery," it would not be just to judge the act by the higher moral standard of modern times. The author's purpose was excellent,—to infuse new courage, devotion, and hope into the hearts of his countrymen, and to encourage them to stand fast by the sacred faith of their fathers; and the means he adopted to accomplish his purpose was not, perhaps, wrong, if judged by the conscience of his age. Such a "pious fraud" is no worse than many another, practised to-day for far less noble ends. At any rate, it found many imitators at the time, and later, both among Jews and Christians. Verses were ascribed by Jews to the early Greek poet, Orpheus, teaching the unity of God, and even making mention of Abraham and Moses! Other verses were ascribed to Linus, Homer, and Hesiod, teaching the observance of the Sabbath. Others still were ascribed to Sophocles, Æschylus, and Euripides, concerning the unity, power, and righteousness of God. And all these false ascriptions, moreover, made by Jews in the first instance, were endorsed by the early Christian fathers, Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, and Clement of Alexandria. In fact, the Book of Daniel is merely the first and ablest of a peculiar class of works, which were composed about the same time, and later, and have received the name of Apocalyptic writings. They were all "forgeries," if we must use so hard a name; though the purpose of their composition was not an ignoble one. For instance, the books known as the "Sibylline Oracles," the "Book of Enoch," the "Fourth Book of Esdras," were works composed by Jews, in all probability before the birth of Jesus, in imitation of the Book of Daniel, and with the same general end in view. They all claimed to have been composed centuries before, and all put historical facts into the mouth of persons long dead, in the form of prophecies made by them. The same phenomenon meets us among the early Christians. There is a book called the "Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," composed in the first half of the second century after Christ, by a Jewish Christian, the aim of which is to make the Jews acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah, and which, in order to accomplish this aim, represents the twelve sons of Jacob as prophesying the history of Jesus in detail. Fabricius mentions similar "Testaments" of Adam, Noah, and Abraham.

Most remarkable of all, perhaps, is the book called the "Ascension of Isaiah," which Luecke dates in the third century after Christ. This purports to give, in the words of the prophet Isaiah himself, an account of his visit to all the seven heavens. On his approach to the seventh heaven, under guidance of an angel, the voice of God the Father forbids him to come nearer, but the voice of God the Son is heard, interceding for him, and at last obtaining permission. The prophet is then admitted. There he sees countless angels, and all the saints from Adam down; also the books of heaven in which all human actions are recorded, and a vast quantity of heavenly clothes, laid up in store for those who believe in the cross of Christ. He then beholds God the Father, God the Son, and the angel of the Holy Ghost at the Son's left hand. The Son and the Spirit converse with him, and call his attention to the great honor conferred upon him in permitting him to see God. This curious book is the work of a Christian hand; and the frequency of those compositions proves that the conscience of those ages was not offended by what we should call literary forgery. Hence I deem it unjust to condemn the author of the Book of Daniel too severely, when Dr. Gieseler, the celebrated historian of the Christian Church, is obliged to speak as follows of the early fathers: "The Christians made use of such expressions and writings as had already been falsely attributed by Jews, from partiality to their religion, to honored persons of antiquity, and altered them in part to suit their own wants, such as the Book of Enoch, and the Fourth Book of Esdras. But writings of this kind were also fabricated anew by Christians, who quieted their conscience respecting the forgery with the idea of their good intention, for the purpose of giving greater impressiveness to their doctrines and admonitions by the reputation of respectable names, of animating their suffering brethren to steadfastness, and of gaining over their opponents to Christianity."

The chief value of the Book of Daniel, apart from its moral and poetical uses, lies in the light it throws on the early formation of the Messianic idea among the Jews, and thereby on the historic roots of Christianity itself. That this idea was the result of a gradual development, no scholar will deny; and we here see it, as it were, in the embryonic stage. It thus appears that the earliest form of this idea was that of a renewal of the ancient theocracy, rather than a renewal of the ancient monarchy,—in other words, a kingdom of God, rather than a kingdom of the Messiah. Even if there are allusions in Daniel to a personal Messiah, which I think is not the case, still they are very infrequent and indistinct, and the chief emphasis is laid on the saints, not on the Christ. Colani appears to me to have understood the true spirit of the book, when he says that the Messianic kingdom of Daniel is rather an aristocracy than a monarchy. As exhibiting the close connection of Christianity with Judaism, and as a very important link in the chain of evidence proving Christianity to be the natural outgrowth and development of Judaism, rather than a new and supernatural graft upon it, the Book of Daniel has permanent importance. As a basis of Millerite predictions of the end of the world, it is, of course, utterly worthless. But its merit as a work of art is high; and so long as noble instincts exist in the human soul, they will be quickened and deepened by its many noble words.

LUCK AND LABOR.—Many people complain of their bad luck when they ought to blame their own want of wisdom in action. Cobden, a distinguished writer in England, thus wrote about luck and labor:

Luck is everything waiting for something to turn up. Labor, with keen eyes and strong will, will turn up something. Luck lies in bed, and wishes the postman would bring him the news of a legacy. Labor turns out at six o'clock, and with busy pen or ringing hammer lays the foundation of a competence. Luck whines. Labor whistles. Luck relies on chances. Labor on character. Luck slips down to indigence. Labor strikes upward to independence.

A GENIAL rector of a village parish in Minnesota found it difficult to get his salary promptly. Latterly it was much behind. Going to one of his delinquent parishioners in the hardware trade, he looked over all his stock of cork-screws very fastidiously, seeking a large one of peculiar strength and size. To the inquiry, "What do you want of such a thing, anyhow?" the answer came, "My dear sir, I want a cork-screw that can draw my salary!" The payments are coming more promptly.—Harper's Monthly.

A physician once advised Sydney Smith to "take a walk upon an empty stomach." "Whose stomach?" asked the wit.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"When I was seventeen years old, my rejection as a witness on account of my disbelief of a state of future rewards and punishments gave rise to an interesting discussion on the subject and an entire change of the laws of — in that respect. The Devil can testify in our State now. Only a few months ago I was attacked again; an attempt was made to remove me from a trust as testamentary guardian of some minors, on the ground that I was an infidel. The case was called before the Supreme Court. It decided my being an infidel was no cause for removal. What was curious, in the Court below it was tried before the same Judge who (thirty years ago) rejected my testimony. He sustained me this time. What I commenced to write about is this,—the last number, containing 'Religious Revivals,' goes home to the quick—with the exception of a 'future state being a sequence to this.' It is a sledge-hammer. As a gentleman in this town said to me the other day,—'Isn't Mr. Abbot a blacksmith?' 'Well, I don't know,' said I. He rejoined, 'I thought he was, he uses the hammer so well.' That number of THE INDEX would have done an immense amount of good, if it could have been spread around about one month ago. I enclose one dollar for you to send that number to the following names."

—"If my little article is not out of your reach, and you do not wish to use it, you will confer a favor by returning it to me. And although the best attribute of a stranger's letter is, too often, its laconic brevity, yet I desire to say a few words. My illiteracy forbids the flattering hope of edifying the highly cultivated, and yet my humble condition and attainments remind me of the lame, maimed, halt, and blind, as bound with them. And I had far rather put on record a simple thought that might, like the fog-bell, guide my peers over life's stormy ocean, than pile egotistic marble to the sky over a body and a life which have alike turned to ashes. Your kind indulgence hitherto encourages a hope that you will still allow me to write you occasionally a short letter, which you shall be at liberty to publish wholly, or in part, or not at all, as you deem best for the good cause you are laboring for so efficiently. A word in reply, when convenient, would enable me to act so as not to annoy you."

—"I wish to add that the more I read your paper and understand your position, the more interested I am in assisting to secure your highest and best success. Ever since boyhood I had been seeking religious comfort and peace of mind, and when at last I found it, I thought myself quite alone, isolated certainly from all around me, until, some year or more ago, I began to listen to Mr. Frothingham in New York. For a business man, I have a large acquaintance with liberal and other religionists all over the country, and from my knowledge of the needs and wishes of the people, I believe your efforts will be recognized to be as timely and welcome, as your position is sound and logical. I see that you can be temperate, considerate, gentlemanly, and charitable towards those who differ, as well as honest, fearless and incisive; and, believe me, the first are as much elements of success in a mission like yours as the latter."

—"I enclose you three dollars, for which please send me THE INDEX and Toledo Blade for one year, commencing Oct. 1st. I accidentally saw a copy of your paper, and was much pleased with its contents. It is just the thing that is wanted by the thinking public to assist them in throwing off the popular superstitions of the age, and will, I trust, meet with the encouragement and support it richly deserves."

—"There are a great many Spiritualists in —, and I want the paper to circulate there, for I regard it a good antidote for Spiritualism, or any other ism. I was pleased with your address to the Spiritualists. I will try and get as many as I can to renew their subscriptions for 1871. 'Don't give up the ship!'"

—"I find a great many good things in your paper which I can find in no other. I have lived sixty years without belonging to any religious organization or secret society. I never felt willing to put on the straight-jacket. I am in the midst of orthodoxy, and should be denounced as an infidel if I should show your paper."

—"We think THE INDEX improves as it grows older; we would not like to do without it. I shall feel it a duty to get others to subscribe for it."

SUPPLICATION.

"An infant crying for the light,
And with no language but a cry."

Sweet spirit! Tender heart that throbbed
Through deepest depths of human pain!
O let me but thy garment touch,
And make my sick soul whole again!

Lord, night is 'round me; terror-forms
Are at my side; the way is lost;
Before me is the gloom; behind,
The waves that may not be recrossed.

My beacon star is quenched in cloud,
Life's glory perished in a breath;
A mortal, weak with mortal woe,
I stand alone with night and death.

Where'er I turn, the world is dark;
And, when I lift my eyes to Thee,
Through the slow tears that scald and blind,
Thy light comes dimly down to me.

O mother-spirit, not a sigh
Escapes thy lowliest child unheard;
My soul is all one cry to Thee—
O answer me with one sweet word!

The gifts of thy dear hand were good;
Love—it was sweet! But, far away,
Now like a beauteous land it seems,
Which I—a pilgrim—leave for aye.

Thou thrice denied! low at thy feet
In my dark night of grief I kneel,
And wait to know Earth has no pain
Too deep for thy sweet touch to heal.

The Index.

NOVEMBER 12, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2.50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two hundred and fifty copies can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us, before the first day of January next, $2.00 for a year's subscription to THE INDEX, we will send gratuitously a copy of the last ANNUAL REPORT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION; provided a desire for it is stated at the time.

To every new subscriber who shall remit to us $2.50, we will send THE INDEX for one year, and also an unbound file of The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1870, edited by Mrs. M. C. Bland, Indianapolis, Ind. We will send a bound volume of the latter (when issued) with THE INDEX for $3.00.

RELIGIOUS DIRT-EATING.

A Sunday or two ago a prayer was made in one of the Toledo churches, of which one sentence is thus reported verbatim:—

"O Lord our God, we know that we are all miserable sinners, unworthy of mercy or compassion, and deserving only of the endless torments of an everlasting hell."

There is nothing unusual in this prayer. It can be heard, substantially the same, on every Sunday of the year, in every city, town and village from Eastport to San Francisco and from Duluth to Brownsville. It is the great burden of the worship in every Catholic, Greek, and Protestant Church on two continents, with the insignificant exception of a few scattered congregations calling themselves Unitarian, Universalist, and the like, which are merely the ragged fringes, the frayed-out edges of the "seamless robe" of the church. It is the utterance of the "Christian consciousness" of all ages,—the wailing refrain of all the great Christian litanies, liturgies and hymns, the inspiring idea of all the great works of Christian art, the fundamental postulate of all the great systems of Christian theology. That a few moss-troopers in the border-land lying between Christianity and Free Religion should disown the jurisdiction of the country whose uniform they wear, is a fact of no consequence in the grave estimation of political boundaries. A sense of sin so overpowering as to destroy self-respect, extinguish all claim to clemency from the inexorable Judge of the universe, and create a consciousness of guilt for which an eternity of hell-torments is confessedly the absolutely just award,—this, we say, is the basis upon which the Christian system rests its one great doctrine of "salvation by Christ alone." The time is at hand when men will wonder that intelligent persons could ever be found to call ideas the exact opposite of these by the name of Christianity.

But yet our pious worshipper is heard declaring that he deserves "the endless torments of an everlasting hell." Did the man really believe it? Or did he play the hypocrite? Or did he babble out the stock-phrases of his sect, without being aware that he was uttering the most deplorable folly?

Possibly he believed it. Other men have believed it, and with such terrible sincerity that they fled to caves and wildernesses, starved themselves with fasts, tore their own flesh with whips, spurned all the joys of life, and foretasted the pangs of the very damned themselves, in order to escape the doom that affrighted them well-nigh to madness. But the day for such faith as this is passing away. It is a faith we put to no man's credit who talks it only on Sunday, and all the rest of the week goes about his business like sane men. If it is real, it is a dreadful reality, and ploughs up by the roots all peace of mind. It does sometimes, even at this day, drive men frantic with terror and land them in a mad-house. Out of fifty patients in an insane asylum under his charge, Dr. Maudsley, the distinguished author of "The Physiology and Pathology of the Mind," declares that seven of them were the victims of this religious delusion. But what sort of a belief in his own danger of hell can a man have, who, after groaning it out in church, goes placidly home to enjoy his dinner in the "bosom of his family?" This is one of the enormous shams of the age, which would amuse, if it did not nauseate.

Possibly the man was a hypocrite. But we doubt it. To be hypocritical, he must have inwardly disbelieved what he outwardly professed. Probably there was no conscious disbelief in his mind. The full-blooded hypocrite is, after all, a rara avis. The Pecksniffs, we are glad to think, are a small minority; and we dislike to hear the harsh and reckless charges of hypocrisy brought so freely by some radicals against "professors of religion." They argue poverty of imagination, bitterness of feeling, and narrowness of mind. Without strong proof, we shall decline to dub our doleful self-accuser a hypocrite.

In our judgment, he was a mere victim of cant. He glibly reeled off the horrid language of his sect without taking in its meaning. Deserve an eternity of torture! To make good this notion, the hard-headed old Puritan logicians taught that every sin, however trifling in common estimation, was infinite in guilt, because committed against an infinite God. But the longest human life, though crowded in every moment with sins black as ink, could only hold a finite quantity of guilt, and would only deserve a finite punishment. You might as well try to cram the universe into a pill-box, as condense infinity of any sort into a human action. If punishment is vindictive, it must be proportioned to desert; if remedial, it must stop when its end is won. The pretence that any man can deserve an endless hell is utterly crazy, and violates every sentiment and principle of justice. It is the very quintessence of absurdity.

But the evil of this nightmare religion is worse than simple folly. It is immeasurably sad to see this abject licking of the feet of Power, this spaniel-like fawning on the hand that holds a rod. Where is the manliness of men, when they thus of their own free will get down into the mud, and besmear themselves from head to foot with the mire of self-depreciation—all for the sake of appeasing the blind fury of a God who, like Draco, punishes with death all offences of all grades? Where is the self-respect of men who can thus be scared into false confessions and glaring lies against themselves?

Our devotee would have blazed with resentment, if anybody had said to him what he said of himself and others. Old President Lord once took a man at his word who, in a prayer-meeting, extravagantly declared himself guilty of breaking all the laws of God—in fact, of being the very chief of sinners; and remarked gravely that he was very sorry to learn that his friend was so very bad a man! On this the late penitent got up in great irritation, and ejaculated with no small heat that "he did not mean that he was any worse than his neighbors." If we were to go to our Toledo devotee and say bluntly—"You are right; you are a miserable sinner; you ought to be damned forever and ever"—we suspect his miserable sinnership would add one more to his list of sins, and indulge his ungodly passions with an assault upon our person. But no friend need be anxious on our account. We have heard too much of this sort of cant to believe that it means anything. It is words without thought,—not hypocritical, yet not sincere.

The more we see of the ruinous effect on character wrought by this system of Orthodoxy, the intenser becomes our detestation of it. It paralyzes every influence which would make men manly, courageous, truthful, free. It is not a harmless thing thus to whine and crouch before an ogre of the imagination. If self-respect is the secret of all great and vigorous and estimable character, whatever lessens it is a curse. What can more terribly lessen it than this canting, servile, morally destructive dirt-eating? If you corrupt a man's religion, you corrupt the only source from which can proceed a purer life, a manlier and nobler spirit. It is because Orthodoxy has become in this age of the world a corrupter of the world's religion, that we would open what eyes we may to its hateful influence. With all the good it does in some respects (and this we would never forget), it is saturated and steeped in terrorism; it degrades man by appealing to his worst motives; it frights him with a hell and a God who cannot get along without it; in short, it saddles him with the curse of devil-worship. In the name of humanity, let the evil be abolished!

A COMPARISON.

A late number of Zion's Herald has the following editorial paragraph:—

"Much is said by Boston Hindus on the effects of Buddhism and Brahminism in India. This testimony of one of our missionaries illustrates their condition out of Christ. Will Mr. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association, write to Rev. Mr. Thoburn for a contribution on the practical workings of Heathenism for his next meeting? He closes some late observations in the Western Advocate on the prevalence of lying, bribery, unchastity, and of unnatural crimes in India, in the following paragraph:—

"I have seen much of the heathen in India. I have watched them in city and country, on the mountains and plains, in their homes and on their journeys, and I have found many things in their character to love and admire; and yet, putting aside all purely worldly considerations, and, moreover, leaving the next world wholly out of account, so wretched does their moral condition appear to me that I could gladly devote my life to the missionary's work, if it proposed nothing further than simply elevating their morals to the very imperfect standard of my native land. To do that alone would be to create a nation!"

The Toledo INDEX will please copy."

We have too much respect for the sincerity and occasional liberality of our Methodist exchange not to comply cheerfully with its request, the point of which, however, we fail to see. There is only one opinion, so far as we know, concerning the actual moral degradation of the Hindu people; but we believe that "Christian" Mr. Thoburn is accomplishing far less in reforming them than "heathen" Keshub Chunder Sen, and that both would find their hands full, if they undertook the job of reforming "Christian" America. Nor do we attribute such moral superiority as may be found here to a religious system that heaps absolute contempt on "mere morality," and teaches that the dirtiest-souled man in Christendom can go straight to heaven from his pew, provided he shuts his eyes to his own dirt and fancies himself washed clean by the "blood of Christ." At any rate, the following extract, clipped from the same number of the Herald as the above, shows that these missionary doctors differ among themselves as to the relative merits of Hindu and Christian influences:—

"The Rev. Dr. Scudder, the celebrated missionary to India, on returning from his prolonged service, and while standing on the deck of the steamer with his son, a youth, heard a gentleman using profane language. 'My friend,' said the Doctor, 'this boy, my son, was born and brought up in a heathen country; but in all his life he never heard a man blaspheme his Maker until now.' The gentleman apologized. It may be new to some that in not one of the many Indian dialects spoken in this country are the words by which the Third Commandment in the Decalogue can be broken.—Church Weekly."

Is the Herald answered? And will it please copy our reply?

A LETTER FROM S. H. MORSE.

BOSTON, Oct. 22, 1870.

DEAR ABBOT:—At length I forward to you my circular and prospectus. I don't know what will come of it. A few weeks will determine. Begging is a business I dislike. I would have worked for nothing to have avoided it the year round, as Patrick might say. But one of two things must be done. Either the idea of resuming The Radical, so far as I am concerned, must be abandoned, or I must proceed on the assumption that there is a sufficient number of persons equally interested in its revival with myself who are willing to put their hands into their pockets, and entrust me with a little of their contents. I took a "vacation" on the subject, and found my decision settled on the side of faith. I concluded to make my appeal, and should it prove to have been made in vain, I would, at least, have the satisfaction of remembering hereafter that I did not abandon the ship without trying to save it. Among many encouraging words by letters, I have had also grave doubts expressed, chief among which is this one (now getting so familiar): "Radicals as a class do not take enough interest in the ideas they intellectually assent to, to bleed for them to any great extent." The same charge has been made against the Liberal Christians. It was the hardest thing in the world to get money out of them; but they would applaud an idea to the echo. It was Wendell Phillips, I believe, who used to tell of a man who left the Church and joined the Anti-Slavery party, and boasted some years after that it used to cost him in his church-going days thirty dollars a year; but since he had been an Anti-Slavery professor, he had not "been bled a penny." Yet the Anti-Slavery people, though, as a matter of fact, belonging to the poorer class, were open-hearted, and open-pocketed, as well. The instance mentioned, Mr. Phillips declares, was the exception. He attributes much of their success in raising funds to the vigorous organization which backed up the idea, and was continually devising new "ways and means." Perhaps it is the new impulse for organization the Unitarians of late are displaying, which increases their ability in the direction of gathering material aid. No doubt, if Radicalism or Free Religion would but get off what some call its high-heeled boots, and "nail its banner on the outer wall," or prepare a "Statement of Faith" for a "campaign document," and put in order all the machinery of a proper discipline, it, too, could command vast sums, and perform great works of conversion.

But right here the partizan, proselyting spirit into which it is so easy for all classes to fall, when the first waves of enthusiasm for the cause begin to be felt, receives from serious, radical minds its first check. The work on hand is too thorough and searching in its character to be floated out upon popular currents of party pride, and blind sectarian zeal. It must deny itself all these accessories. Not partizan itself, but striving to see and state the truth, it is obliged to conform its methods to its aim. The task is difficult. Its position is easily misunderstood. It is likely to be regarded as a poor, undefined, nerveless movement. Even those friendly to its ideas lose their patience. "If you believe anything, why not say so, and strive by all fair means to put what you believe through the country?" Certainly, by all fair means. But what means are fair?

It seems to me that the "fair means" which Radicalism should employ are those which do not carry the cause by force of numbers, nor by any outward pressure brought to bear to suppress individual convictions. Freedom and frankness are not to be checked by popular judgments. It is not enough that we have put away instruments of persecution. We should not create a party-sentiment which is sure to repress private expression. I know some maintain the possibility of having organized efforts which will not only not repress, but will involve the largest exercise of private judgment. This may be true where there is no design to carry a special end. If the object is merely to compare views, and then go away and leave the work of "spreading" those views, as it is called, to the workings of the free spirit thus generated in the minds and hearts of those who participate, why, the chances are that something like free thought and free expression will be guaranteed. But the moment you say,—"Now let us agree on something, and convert the world to it," faint lines begin to gather about each man's thought; his horizon is bounded by party discipline, however slight it may be; and how long after that does it take to enclose what we "believe" within a Chinese wall? It depends entirely upon the amount of zeal the new sect is able to manufacture, and how fast. It is of no use for any set of persons to say—"We know it has always been so in the past, but we intend to act differently." What has been, will be; the law of every such programme is the same. Instead of gaining a clearer sight of principles, all begin to shade their eyes to discover on what they can agree. Growth is arrested; we are finished off as Orthodox, Baptist, or Free Religionist, it matters not what name, nor much what kind of a creed. The effect in all cases is alike.

Now in politics there is some ground for this course of action. There, a definite and immediate end is proposed. The result is only to be obtained by mutual compromise of private judgments. An average right is to be struck. Each cannot have his own way. All give a little, get what they can, and wait. Numbers are authoritative, and settle the question, for the time being, at least. Otherwise the affairs of state would come to a dead-lock.

In religious affairs there is no such urgency. Setting aside the ancient notion that dogmatic statements of belief are all-important—that scheme of salvation being in reality not at all allied to principles and spiritual growth—we rest in the faith that to-day's sun and even to-morrow's may go down, and still we hazard nothing in not being prepared to say that we have solved the great problems. What we believe, we will believe naturally. Our beliefs may grow; we will not force or hurry them. We are seekers always. Yet convictions we have,—such as the mind has freely arranged. We may not be able to parade them on a given moment to satisfy an idle curiosity. We may be a little ignorant as regards their shape or color ourselves. But when a legitimate occasion offers, when statement is important and action demanded, we shall be pretty sure to find out what we believe, and where we stand. All the more commanding will our beliefs be to us then, because we have not been too familiar with them, and did not take them second-hand from party creeds, or any ancient or modern wise teacher. We have listened, we have heard all; and what we have heard has had its due effect, without interfering with our own direct vision.

This independent attitude of each mind is of more consequence in our republican civilization than the adoption of any set of opinions, however excellent. It is the religious attitude. When we enter a debating "conference" to determine our faiths, God stands without the door. I mean, if God appears for us in our innermost thought, our profoundest conviction, his presence is not manifested when and where we are bereft of such conviction or faith by the impious wrangling and balloting of any so-called religious assembly. That the work is carried on amid profuse adulations of love, does not better it.

Well, I have gone beyond my own intention and your patience, I fear, in touching upon these points. I only meant to say that, as the methods of a Religious Radicalism do not admit of the aid of great, standing, organized bodies, but discourage these, the work of establishing a pecuniary prosperity in cases like THE INDEX or The Radical, is rendered extremely difficult. All the old and well-proved appliances are with us discarded. We cannot make people "shell out" whether they want to or not. We cannot enforce the idea that they ought to subscribe themselves, and spend half their time in getting others to come and do likewise. We must, in the main, abide whatever self-prompting action the "good people" cheer us with. The question, therefore, seems to be—Are the friends of a free, progressive religion up to acting liberally in its behalf, without being wheeled into line and service to the music of ecclesiastical life and drum?

Yours truly,

S. H. MORSE.

HUME'S ESSAY ON MIRACLES.

I took up lately what purports to be an English reprint of the original edition of Hume's essays. But, in looking over the table of contents, I missed the essay on "Miracles." The omission was remarkable, as Hume was more generally known by this essay than by all the rest. And as, like Brutus' image, the essay was more conspicuous by absence, I procured the original edition, and compared it with the modern reprint. The title of this latter work reads as follows: "Essays, Literary, Moral, and Political, by David Hume, Esq., the Historian,"—and below—"A careful reprint of the 2 Vols. 8vo. Edition."

This title-page bears a falsehood on its face. For not only the essay on "Miracles," but the following one, "Of a Particular Providence and of a Future State," is gone; and also, in Vol. I. (old edition), the essays numbered IX. and X.—"Of Superstition and Enthusiasm"—and—"Of Avarice"—are omitted. This could not be accidental, for, in the language of Truthful James—

"But for ways that are dark, and tricks that are vain,
Those London [and American] booksellers are peculiar,
Which the same that I dare to maintain."

Scotland and the Scotch used to be the butt of the English, and a by-word for dishonesty. But the tables are turned, when a London bookseller has the effrontery to send out a castrated edition of Hume's essays to the world, as a whole and complete edition.

What are we to think of English fairness and liberality after this? It is enough to make the Scotch writer turn over in his grave. The trade may justify it on economical grounds, and the Christian public may applaud the outrage; but every lover of truth and of fair play must feel indignant at the fraud, and condemn the bigotry of a bookseller. The less of such bigotry and bookselling, the better.

But our main purpose was to call attention to this essay on "Miracles." The best of Hume is there—the clear understanding of his subject, the knowledge of causes, the appreciation of facts and ideas, the intuition of principles and first truths, the keen analysis of arguments, the cross-examination of testimonies, the logic, the crushing irony, the cleverness, the good taste and soberness of mind, the chaste language, the crystalline style, the simple and clear statement of a plain, old-fashioned lever of the truth. This was David Hume, the opposite of a bigot, the enemy of all enthusiasm, of all fanaticism. Nowhere is he shown to better advantage than in this essay on "Miracles." It was the crisis of his powers. Elsewhere, the author seems to have put forth but half his strength. But here he has exerted his utmost abilities. The occasion was critical, the theme of unparalleled interest. A timorous bookseller, an apathetic English public, cannot see nor hear this tremendous fight of Free Religion and Superstition in the eighteenth century. But we can. We follow Hume's argument still, as if watching a great battle. How will it turn? We are not the British public, to neglect the Bayard of that era. We do not turn pale, when stripping David sends his smooth stone crashing into the forehead of the giant Philistine. Philistinism in the English Church may groan and sigh over the defeat; but we shall not be sorry for all that.

David Hume was a modest man, but courageous withal. He could defend himself. But he attacked with an air of magnificent courage and confidence. Woe to the popular superstition, or woe to him! He had vast learning and great resources at command. He answers to Milton's idea of a man "drawing out his reasons as a battle ranged." He saw before him the hosts of superstition entrenched behind the Miracles; therefore he opened his parallels and laid siege to the citadel. He attacked at the vital point, he attacked in force. To say that he carried the works by storm, is only to utter the truth. Christians may deny it. They have denied it, and have made endless attempts to answer him, to recover the lost ground. But on his own ground, Hume has never been answered, and he never will be. It is like discharging arrows at the sun.

The essay on "Miracles" is the beginning and foundation of modern Radicalism, or Free Religion. It could not have a better beginning. Nor could it rest on a surer basis. "They do the greatest injury to religion," wrote Hume, "who endeavor to establish it upon a false basis." This was the key-note of his moral and religious writings. The essay—"Of Providence and of a Future State"—is an answer to those who require the Deity to act after their own manner. Hume accepts the universe as it is. He overthrows the god of religionists, the god of all false religions. The essay would console, and, I think, satisfy the doubts of your friend Austin Kent. But the essay on "Miracles" is the new starting-point of human inquiry. It is the Pharos whose light is seen by those far out at sea. Hume had that "modest doubt" which Shakespeare calls the "beacon of the wise." And how it burns up, to what a pitch of greatness and intensity it rises, in this essay! It has left a trail of splendor over all religious literature from that day to this. It contains the germs of the teachings of Darwin and Huxley. In this essay we first become acquainted with the idea of an immutable order of nature,—an idea which has changed the face of the religious world. It affords the only solid ground and footing to modern critical investigation. It is the father of Strauss, and the presumed teacher, or predecessor, of Kant. Huxley has paid Hume the compliment of considering him a greater man than Kant. At any rate he was before Kant. He discovered, so to speak, the new world which the German philosopher took possession of in his own name. It is a new continent of truth, a new world, and a new age to which he introduces us.

It is the age of Bacon and Newton, the age of the spelling-book and steam-engine, of the sewing-machine and Atlantic telegraph—an age indeed of miracles, though not the age of miracle. The age of miracle was the age of twilight wherein the world walked in fear of ghosts and hobgoblins. But with Hume, this twilight world, oppressed with sleep and with nightmares, begins to grow awake; it clears and opens into broad daylight. The long night of superstition has passed away. It is morning at last. "Man is, indeed, the dream of a shadow; but when a God-given beam visits him, then his own being glows with a bright radiance and around him is a lovely world."

Man stands upon the shores of the New World and this fresh morning-beam of Revelation visits him. Awake, Radicals of England and America! Let our friend Morse republish this essay in the first number of the resuscitated Radical magazine; for it was an eye-opener to the world, and the first great step in the way of Free Religion. Honor to Hume!

THE CAUSES OF CHARACTER.

SPRINGDALE, CEDAR CO., IOWA, Oct. 24, 1870.

BROTHER ABBOT:—In your discussion with Mr. Crane, you say—"We want to clear away the fog." Well may you or any of us say this. We shroud our thoughts and feelings in such a mist of sophistry and expediency, that neither knows what the other thinks. Men falsify by admission and omission. I see it here in this Quaker community, one of the best sects that ever accepted a blind theology. I honor them as a sect and as individuals for their great freedom-loving souls. Yet even with them there exists that sophistry and expediency which is fatal to their present growth and development. For instance, I talk to a dozen different individuals at different times; I find them mentally ripe for the new truths of the coming era. But let these dozen individuals come together, each one artfully conceals his real sentiments from his fellows, and each thinks the other a blind adherent of church dogmas. I feel convinced that, if men could cast away their hypocritical cloaks, the fog would be lifted which now obscures. But as I write, one thought or one influx of memory succeeds another. I must have full charity; and why? The force that has driven you so far on the railway of thought and action, has not yet propelled them so far. Circumstances control us. What circumstances? The great eternal principles or laws which prompt us to act, the innate force of our organizations and the stimulus of our surroundings. Hence I feel that men cannot think and act otherwise than as they do.

I had a friend who had large conscientiousness, benevolence, firmness, causality and comparison, with less acquisitiveness than either of the other organs. He would not wrong his neighbor, though he knew that he would lose his life by his tenacious adherence to his integrity. He would not, to save his right arm, do a dishonorable act, though he had the full assurance that none save himself would ever know it.

I knew a man once who possessed what this friend lacked, and lacked what this friend possessed. His home, with the exception of brief intervals, was from boyhood until old age and death in the penitentiary. The only force that could restrain his positive vicious organization was prison walls. These two pictures are not overdrawn, neither are they the fruits of imagination. The organization of the first taught him that fear was foolishness. His benevolence, gushing forth, urged him to war on oppressors for the rights of others. He died more nobly than Christ died—never asking for the cup to pass from him, but courting the fate which he deemed would assist in bringing justice to the oppressed. Now, both of these men acted naturally; they obeyed the promptings from within. When they acted, they conformed to the stimulus from within; but neither would have acted, had there been sufficient force from without to prevent; nor would they have conceived such phases of action, had there been less force within. Nor was it possible for one to execute the conceptions of the other, or to create such conceptions. The point that I aim to make, then, is this. With a positive tendency of the organization in any direction, combined with a similar tendency of surroundings, the result will correspond to the organization.

A man may be sufficiently viciously inclined to conceive an action; but having cautiousness and approbateness largely developed, he does not execute it, from the dread of the disapproval of others or the consequences following, if detected. He then is absolutely controlled by the combination from without and within; but had the surroundings corresponded to his own tendency, and the pressure been removed, the act would have been committed.

My impressions are that to attribute merit or demerit to actions is unphilosophical. If I do a good act, or a succession of good acts, I am prompted or impelled to do so from some organ, benevolence or approbateness, or both, or more, possessing sufficient energy to operate in that direction. The having these organs well developed and active should not induce me to take any particular credit to myself, when I had no hand in my own creation or building. I might perhaps feel a little happiness or complacency in the knowledge that the eternal laws of progression had advanced me so far in the scale of development. Yet the knowledge that I did not create myself would suggest that my brother man who was tempted to steal the horse did not create his peculiar formation, either.

I have seen two little children, of two families, together,—one with a formation of brain indicating an advanced mental and moral development, the other dissimilar in all respects from the first, the very reverse in organization. The parents could be recognized in their progeny. Are these children subjects of merit or demerit? Can the child poorly developed in brain, in all mental and moral respects, with all the freedom asked for, make of himself a first-class man, either mentally, morally or spiritually?

Our ideas of right and wrong are matured as we ascend the plane of development. The organization that has passed beyond the war-point sees a terrible wrong in killing a man under any circumstances; while another would feel as if he had performed a meritorious deed in killing an enemy to his household or to his country,—a thorough approval of the act.

A man in this State (Iowa) killed his mother. While in prison he appeared to be comparatively happy, showed no indications of disapproval of the act, but grew fat and sleek while awaiting trial and ultimate penalty. His natural inclination to murder led him to the act; his lack of approbateness and fear caused him to ignore public opinion and the ultimate penalty.

The prodigy in music can claim no merit. At three or four years of age, he can perhaps perform with the exactness of an old master; while I, perhaps, with better surroundings, cannot, after thirty years of trial, follow the simplest tune. So in mathematics; so in morals. Men with the experience of a lifetime cannot obey the simplest laws of morals any more than I can follow the simplest tune. If we are free agents in any respect, then phrenology is not a science, and philosophy has lost its logic. But phrenology has demonstrated itself to be a science, and we are compelled to act as ordered, unless a more positive force from without overbalances the inherent force from within. It may be asked,—“If we are not free agents in any respect, what basis have we for an improvement in morals?” I answer,—The grain of corn planted in the moist earth acts from the promptings of an impulse which it cannot resist. It receives an impetus towards development from principles that are ever-active, ever progressive. So with man, ever restless, ever striving, urged on and upwards by a force as unyielding and resistless as the waves of ocean in their paroxysms of seeming madness. Man moves before the wave of progress as I have seen a good ship ride before the wind, with a hurricane in her wake. All history records the growth of the human race. From out of the greatest social convulsions, from out of scenes of courage and of violence, there spring the grandest results,—results which we did not expect, from causes which we did not create.

In your "Chaos and Cosmos," you discerned truly the grand order that underlies the seeming chaos of the physical world. My faith is firm that the same beautiful order exists in the mental and moral world, as well as in the physical, and that we are incapable of acting otherwise than in conformity to its supreme dictations, like a locomotive on a perfect track, with a full head of steam, with no choice of its route, but speeding onward—obedient to the force that drives and the grooves that guide.

As each streamlet follows its natural course to the ocean; directed by a law which masters, so do we move on in a natural channel towards the grand ocean of truth and intelligence, moved by a power more mighty than our wills.

Now, brother Abbot, I think that I understood your text in regard to this matter, and have undertaken to speak to the point in a plain, common-sense way, without the varnish of rhetoric, which too often conceals the meaning from minds of my calibre. But if the common sense of one individual utterly fails to appreciate the common-sense of another, then it is only another argument that we do not create our own judgments, but that each judgment comes spontaneously from an organization, which can only be changed by and through the progressive forces which control all things

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

I remain yours in truth,

GEO. B. GILL.

THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

We shall devote our space this week to giving such report as we are able of the Convention held by the Free Religious Association in Cincinnati, on the 1st and 2d instant. According to the arrangement, of which notice has been given in THE INDEX, the Convention met on Tuesday evening, the 1st, in the capacious Jewish synagogue, over which Dr. Wise presides. The assembly was large, and of excellent quality. Unfortunately, Dr. Wise himself was not present, being detained in New York by some urgent business in connection with a Hebrew Council. Dr. Lilienthal was also absent from the city for the same reason. This was the only important drawback on the entire Convention. Both of these gentlemen were deeply interested, and the time had once been postponed to suit their convenience. Still, the Jewish Council in New York did not release them in season. The fact, however, that the Convention held its first session in the Hebrew temple showed their cordial hospitality and sympathy, and indicates in a striking manner one of the central ideas of the Association. And though the Rabbis were absent, very many of their congregation were present, not only at this opening session, but at the meetings the next day; and the Jewish faith was not unrepresented in the discussions. The Cincinnati Gazette says of the audience Tuesday evening, that it was composed of "Hebrews, Christians and Nullifidians." We might not accept wholly this description; yet it is certain there were present earnest men and women of very diverse faiths and religious antecedents, who yet found beneath their differences some principle of unity, and felt themselves progressing in the same direction.

The opening session was devoted to setting forth the general principles and aims of the Free Religious Association. This work was very efficiently done by the President of the Association, O. B. Frothingham, who in an address of an hour's length held the close attention of the large audience, and was very felicitous both in the precision and comprehensiveness of his statement. The congregation, whether Hebrew, Christian, or Nothingarian, through his words, were drawn under the spell of a real fellowship on the ground of their common humanity; and we venture to say that in that Hebrew Temple which stands with so many centuries of various religious tradition behind it, and which yet opens its doors to the fresh thought of to-day and holds them open to the future, there was not a little of the pure worship which is "in spirit and in truth."

We should be glad to print the whole of his address; but that, of course, is out of the question in our little space. The Gazette, printed, the next morning, almost a verbatim report. We must content ourselves here with the following brief extract from its report:—

"He said it was strange that an association that simply places itself outside of all sects, and plants itself upon the religious idea, pure and simple, should be so utterly, completely, and persistently misunderstood and misrepresented. It is said, for instance, to be a company of individuals, discontented people, satisfied with nothing—people who cannot worship with their neighbors, or utter the name of God with their neighbors, or blend their moral or spiritual thoughts with their neighbors, but who must stand apart, so many men and so many women, each one spinning his own little cobweb and imagining that that is the spiritual universe, having no communion, no large sympathy, no feeling for tradition, no sense of brotherhood in the spiritual world. He said, our communion is the largest in the world. We take in all. Our roots go down deeper than those of the world's faith, for we do not stop until we get to human nature, out of which all the faiths have grown. Our sympathies are so broad that we will call no believer a foe, and we would make every believer a friend. But we know no method by which we can strike the depths of the current of this great sympathy, but by sinking the shafts down through our own individual natures.

"The speaker then referred to the great Artesian well in Chicago, whose shaft had been sunk twelve hundred feet, through several hundred feet of solid rock, and whose waters, it is said, come from no source nearer than the Rocky Mountains. And so, he said, if you are going to reach the current of the water of life, if you are going to strike the veritable channel of God, you must not go to the little pools that are about here on the surface; you must not even take the larger ponds; you must not even take the grand lakes. You must stand where you are, as individuals, and go down from the point where you stand into this universal human consciousness, which is older than religion, and deeper than all faiths, and broader than all communions, whose foundations are from the unseen spheres, and whose channels run down through all this human nature of ours, beneath all our feet: and nobody knows it except he knows himself."

Mr. Frothingham was introduced by Hon. Charles Reemelin, of Cincinnati, who spoke a few words of welcome, and presided at the opening session. Rev. E. C. Towne, of Chicago, followed Mr. Frothingham with a brief address in the same general line of thought. The Convention then adjourned till Wednesday morning.

The sessions on Wednesday were held in the main hall of the new church of the First Congregational Society, of which Rev. Thomas Vickers is the minister. As the Synagogue where the Convention began its meetings represents the progressive, rationalistic plan of Judaism, so this church edifice represents the most advanced position of Christianity. The Free Religious Association might, perhaps, prefer as a general rule to hold its Conventions in a public hall; but the generous offer which put both the temple and the church at its service, presented an opportunity of illustrative symbolism which the Association was very glad to accept.

The forenoon session of Wednesday was devoted to the special topic,—"The Unity of Spiritual Freedom, and the opportunity which America offers for its development." The subject was opened by a paper by the Secretary of the Association,—in which he attempted to show, both from reason and history, that, while unity is the religious ideal, it can only be attained on the basis of perfect individual freedom,—each man in mental and spiritual rights being the peer of his brother. In the history of Christendom there has been the stage of ecclesiasticism (Catholicism,) the stage of individualism (Protestantism,) and now was opened, on this basis of individual freedom and equality, the stage of universal fellowship and brotherhood. For this era, America, through its principle of civil and social freedom, presented the most favorable conditions. In this country, the speaker thought, through the contact and interaction of races and religions, is to be developed the true idea of religious unity and fellowship. The subject was then opened to free discussion. Dr. Curtis, of Cincinnati, spoke of the identity of human organism, physically, mentally, and spiritually, as indicating the true basis of fellowship; true unity can be based on nothing less than the wholeness of humanity. Hon. Charles Reemelin agreed with the idea that religions are modified by race, country, and nationality, but thought it a great delusion to suppose that America is to be the special field of a free order of religious development. Europe, and of Europe, Germany, was, in his opinion, the natural centre and initiator of all progressive movements. He did not see how putting all the religions and nationalities into a bag and shaking them up was going to produce any higher order of religion or race. Rev. Rowland Connor said that it was just this bag-shaking that the religions and races needed. Out of the German, the Irishman, the Frenchman, the Asiatic, the African, America proposed to make a man. So out of the different theologies and faiths, shaking off their antagonisms and eccentricities, she proposed to make religion. Mrs. Graham, of Cincinnati, spoke in the same direction. Though ideas might come from Europe, this country offered better room for their elaboration and development. In the poorest boys and girls in America there was an elasticity of step not to be seen in the peasantry of Germany. That was the expression of America's hope and opportunity. Prof. Reuss, of Indiana, of the Hebrew faith, drew illustrations from Judaism confirmatory of the essay, and spoke enthusiastically of the free religious movement. He was followed by Rev. James Challen, of the city, who spoke in behalf of the supernatural view of Christianity. All the best things seemed to him to come from Christianity. He had no faith in any other religion, nor in this religion of reason and development that was so much talked of. To him primitive Christianity was the rock on which everything rested. The hour of adjournment having arrived, the Convention took a recess till 2½ P. M.

The afternoon session was devoted to the topic,—"The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition." This was introduced by F. E. Abbot. He defined superstition as belief in irrational power, and dogmatism as half-rationalized superstition. And these were always in league with despotism. They kept the mind and soul enslaved. Therefore Free Religion must wage perpetual warfare upon them. He showed how strongly they were lodged in the hearts and beliefs of people everywhere, and how people, thinking themselves free, were unconsciously under their power. This he illustrated by the sectarian condition of schools and colleges in America. In no one of them could a free-thinking teacher, known to be such absolutely, and whose thought carried him beyond the limits of Christianity, be employed. They were all in bonds. Free Religion had a gigantic work to do in combating and overthrowing this exclusive, dogmatic, and unscientific spirit. Mr. Towne followed, bringing further illustration from his own experience. Messrs. Vickers, Frothingham, and Potter also spoke on the same side; and Rev. Mr. Challen and an Irishman, probably a Catholic, who declined to give his name, made some opposing statements.

In the evening Hon. Charles Reemelin read a carefully prepared essay on the question,—"Will the Coming Man attend church?" Mr. Reemelin's answer was that the coming man would not attend church,—that the sentiment and practical purpose of the church organization were being outgrown by the reason, science, and common sense of the age. Teachers of ethics and science would always be called for, but not in the garb of priests or clergymen, and not in the sacred enclosure of pulpits. The essay was the suggestive thought of one of the thinking and practical men of the day. We hope it may be printed somewhere entire. It opened the whole subject of religious organization, and called out addresses upon various points from Messrs. Towne, Abbot, Potter, Connor, Vickers, and Frothingham, each speaker giving his most earnest thought on this very vital question of the times. There was a general agreement that the church must be very radically transformed; changed, indeed, so essentially that the church of the future and the church of the past might not know each other; and yet it was remembered that the religious sentiment, out of which all worship has come, belongs to human nature, and it was urged that this sentiment must always have some specific expression. This meeting was felt to be the best of the series. An audience of thoughtful people filled the hall, and the speaking manifestly came from the heart as well as the head. No one, certainly, who was there could say that this was mere negation and destruction. It was the thought and utterance of earnest believers and builders.

And so ended the Cincinnati Convention,—a successful and happy opening of the series. The weather was delightful, the hospitality of friends unbounded; and we departed with fresh faith and hope and courage for the cause which the Free Religious Association represents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Nervousness, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,

Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1897.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,

Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, April 22d, 1896.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,

Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, June 1st, 1893.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,

Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

N

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

Sold by druggists throughout the world.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

TUESDAY EVENING SESSION, NOV. 1.

An audience, goodly in size and attentive in manner, composed of Hebrews, Christians and Nullifidians, assembled at the Jewish Temple, on the southeast corner of Plum and Eighth streets, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 1, to listen to a discourse by the Rev. O. B. Frothingham upon Free Religion. The discourse was introductory to the Convention of the Free Religious Association, which is being held in Mr. Vickers' Church, northeast corner of Plum and Eighth streets.

Judge Hoadley had been designated to perform the office of introducing Mr. Frothingham to the audience, but, as he was detained by professional duties, that service was performed by the Hon. Charles Reemein.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S ADDRESS.

The Free Religious Association, friends, presents itself this evening for the first time outside of the city of Boston. Massachusetts-born, with Massachusetts traditions, with the New England spirit of investigation, inquiry, skepticism, unbelief, it has hitherto confined itself to its own climate and meridian, and has asked the attention of thinking men and women in and about Boston to what it has to say. Dissatisfied with this circumscribed sphere, believing that its thought is large enough for the whole country, assured that its word is especially for Western men and women, that the faith it proposes is the faith of the new age and not of the old, it ventures bravely forth to meet Western men, looking them straight in the eye, and, without any qualification or pledge, placing before them its last word.

We are happy in being allowed to hold our meeting in this grand Hebrew Temple, a fit symbol, at least, of the grandeur, the breadth, the power, the vitality, of the thought that possesses us, not that we possess.

A TRIBUTE TO JUDAISM.

We had hoped to have had here the presence of Dr. Wise and Dr. Lillenthal, whom absence on duty in New York detains. We have not been fortunate, we may say, in securing Rabbis. Two years in succession we tried to get a genuine Jew to sit on our platform without success, having promises, but no presence. At our last anniversary in Boston, in May, Dr. Wise was present, and aided us by his eloquent language and his fervent soul. Then we had a Rabbi without a temple; now we have a temple without a Rabbi. Would that we could have both! And if, in addition to the Rabbi, we could have a full-blooded Turk, a white-turbaned Parsee, a representative of Indian theism, Chunder Sen, for instance, and if, going outside of any of these recognized religions of the world, we could have here on this wide platform representatives of the faith all but obsolete, and if we could anticipate a little, and get in some specimen of the grand infidelity that is to represent the faith of the future, our hearts would be satisfied and glad.

But here, in a temple dedicated to the old faith of Judaea, we feel entirely at home. The oldest faith and the newest; the mother of Christianity and Christianity's last-born child; the faith whose first temple exists not only in the diagrams that the antiquarian can draw, and whose successions of magnificent temples lie buried hundreds of feet under ground in Judaea, and whose last temples rise in all our great cities, larger than any that Christendom builds, whose finest temple, perhaps, in this country, stands on the great Fifth Avenue, in New York, larger, mightier, more costly, more magnificent, more gorgeous than any temple that Christendom has yet succeeded in building; the old faith that enunciated to the world the belief in the one God, and that now to the world, through the lips of its last teachers, preaches a doctrine so rational, so simple, so pure, so serene, so lofty that it spans all the other faiths, as the all-covering sky spans this cathedral—we are at home, I say, with that old and yet new faith. We are brothers with it; we are children of it. We stand side by side with its largest expositors in teaching a rational and simple religion.

A RABBI'S DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

I know of no words in which I can more fitly state our view of faith than those I have seen for the first time this evening, written by a Jewish Rabbi, which read as follows:—

"True, genuine religion is nothing else but the terms whereby we understand that exaltation of the soul which recognizes its own superiority, while at the same time it is forced to confess its own finiteness and dependence. True, genuine religion is nothing else save that earnest and intense aspiration of the divine spirit placed by God in man after the noblest, the purest, the highest, the unconquerable desire to look up to the Infinite Being as the embodiment of perfection; that fervent attachment, love and veneration for the Author of all, that constant and devout wish to come into perfect communion with Him, that deep humility with which it acknowledges the impossibility of such internal connection, that feels the immense distance which must still exist, how near soever it may appear."

And again, turning to another passage by the same writer:

"Sacrifice is dead. The Jewish nationality as a separate political organization is overthrown. The belief in the restoration of Israel to the land of their fathers, and that the Redeemer will come to Zion, is an exploded theory. God be praised for all His mercies."

CHARACTER OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

In the spirit of these words, if not in their strict letter, we are here to-night. Our mission is that, not of a sect, not of a denomination, not of a class, but of an association organized for peace. May I not say that we are a Religious Peace Society? What is the mission of a Peace Society? It is not to abolish the nations. It is not to annihilate the peculiarities which make the different peoples of the earth what they are. It is not to abolish France, or Germany, or Spain, or England, or Russia. The Peace Society leaves all these nations as God has made them—each with its individual genius, each with its animating spirit and aim, each with its all-conquering purpose, each with its peculiar form of civilized life, each with its own national industry, and bids them go forward, each toward its own providentially-appointed goal. But it says to them, each and all: Let your nationality consist in being true to the genius of humanity, accepting that first of all. Throw down your castle walls; demolish your forts; turn your war ships into merchant vessels; beat your spears into pruning-hooks, and your swords into plowshares. Learn to have confidence in one another; learn to trust in your mutual relationships. Learn that you can work best when you work with common understandings, and for common ends; when you play into each other's hands, not when you drive bolts into each other's hearts.

The Peace Society would put all nations on a fraternal basis, one with the other, but it would leave every nation strictly to itself, and would encourage them to emulate one another—not in military prowess, not in military reputation, not in power to beat one another to atoms, but in their power each to do more for the world than any of its neighbors can succeed in doing. This rivalry in brotherhood, this rivalry in the spirit of friendliness, this rivalry in all grand and noble aims and interests, this the Peace Society would encourage.

And so we, as a Religious Peace Society, say to the sects: "Be as you are; cherish your fundamental idea; cling to the traditions of your religion; perfect your organizations; extend your domain; but do it all in the interest of faith. Pull down your sectarian walls; cease to man castles with columbiads; cease to arrange your ministry into brigades and platoons." It says: "Be brothers; try to understand each other; take each other at the best, and not at the worst; see in what points you correspond; see in what aims you can work together; see what great purposes you can fulfil, and be satisfied with that. You Roman Catholics, you of the Greek Church, you of the Protestant sects, you Calvinists, you Lutherans, you Armenians, you Socinians, we do not quarrel with you for holding your dogmas as you do, but for the spirit in which you hold them."

DEPLORABLE CONDITION OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.

Friends, at present the Christian world is a great array of hostile camps. There is no unity, there is no fellowship, there is no common understanding, no common enthusiasm, no common persuasion, no common belief, no common purpose. While some are striving to get men into a heaven beyond the grave, others are striving to make this world they live in a place worthy to be called heaven. We are all at cross purposes. We are all launching our thunderbolts at each other's breasts. The condition of Christendom is a chaos. The sects absolutely refuse to do justice one to another. They will not take the pains to understand each other's leading thought. They will not go out of their way an inch to put their hands into each other's hands to help in any common cause. Our churches are fortified castles. Our pulpits are heights from which we storm the batteries of our fellow-believers. No member of one sect will exchange pulpits with the member of another sect.

There is incessant misrepresentation—may I not say there is incessant abuse? The religious press vies with the secular press, even in political times, when party passion runs the highest, in misrepresenting and misconstruing—wronging—may I not say maligning?—one another. It is the rarest thing to take up a religious newspaper and find the least justice done to a newspaper that represents another sect. It is the commonest thing to find words twisted out of their connection, if not turned upside down, arguments misquoted, and the very reputation of men who do not hold the same form of faith, their very personal reputation, undermined and broken down, if possible, for sectarian purposes alone. I am not speaking too strongly. I believe there is no man of any prominence in any denomination that has not suffered from assaults, malignant assaults, from professors of the same Christianity who belonged to an opposite camp.

Now we of the Free Religious Association say—"Let this be done away with. Come to some mutual understanding. Do not forever be annihilating each other's work. Do not forever be subverting one another's foundations. Be men. Be believing men, if you will, you Romanists, you Calvinists, you Lutherans; stick to your positions! stand by your ideas! assert your faith! hold up your banner; but be thankful before God that your brothers are doing the same thing on their fields. You engineer your own plans; let your brother engineer his. Make allowances for the differences of education, the differences of birth, of tradition. Make allowances for the difference of needs in this great world of needs. Take it for granted that every sect, every party, every religion that is fairly born into this world, that claims to have a work there, has a providential mission there, and be thankful that it is so." That in general is the position of the Free Religious Association. It is a Peace Society.

WHAT THE FREE RELIGIONISTS WAR AGAINST.

But a Peace Society proclaims war against something. It declares war against war. And so we say the sects must cease to be sectarian. The denominations must cease to be denominational. While the different churches and parties mature, develop, apply their faith, they must do it in the spirit of faith. We have no objection to creeds which help men to believe rationally. We have no objection to communion which will teach men broadly and nobly to commune. We have no objection to a rite or sacrament which will help people to be kings and priests to themselves. We have no objection to a religious organization to make noble, religious men and women. We have no objection to your sectarian forms and usages when the sectarian purpose is taken away. The peace man has no objection to the brass of cannon, supposing the metal should be turned into the making of monuments in the memory of the civilizers of the earth. The peace man has no objection to the metal which is founded into gun barrels. He only quarrels with its being founded into gun barrels. . . .

And so we say to the sectarian in the churches that it is the truest church which makes the truest men and women. Just as that is the best school which enables people to dispense with going to school; just as that is the best gymnasium which enables men to be so strong that they can dispense with gymnasiums; so we say that is the grandest church which quickest enables men and women to live noble lives without the help of a church. That is the most magnificent creed which teaches men to believe rationally, according to the dictates of science and of faith. That is the noblest organization which in the shortest space of time will put men and women into such complete possession of their faculties that they shall need no religious organization. Those are the noblest sacraments which shall make every man and woman to be a priest and priestess to himself or herself.

THE MILLENNIUM OF RATIONALISM.

When the churches shall come upon that ground, then they will rival one another in proving which can do that same needful work in the most complete manner and in the shortest possible way, then they will emulate one another in good works; and that will be the truest religion, will stand most vindicated before society, which does that work best. Then the world can choose whether it will be Romanist, of the Greek Church, of the Hebrew Church, of the Protestant Churches, or of no church at all, when they see which one of these churches makes the best society, turns out the best men, organizes most completely the civilizing forces of the world, and best promotes industry, education, peace, good-will, the abolition of wars, the extension of liberty, and the encouragement of all those great, rational powers which lift man out of the neighborhood of the brute. The sects then will not fight each other; they will simply emulate each other.

A RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION WITHOUT A CREED.

The Free Religious Association has no creed of its own. Its creed is creedlessness. Its organization is disorganization. It does not wish to muddle all religions together—to throw them all together in a heap of muck, and let them steam. It wishes to find, if it can, some central principle in which they can all sympathize, and on which they can all unite, and in the inspiration of which they can all work. It has no creed, for then it would be a sect. It is large, ample, hospitable, opening all its doors in all directions, that all the pilgrims from all quarters of the earth can come in. And it has the windows open, that the winds may blow through from every quarter of the heavens.

It has no creed. It may have one of these days. When in its effort to get to the heart of this religious problem, when, by the exercise of science and reflection, intellect, thought, it gets nearer and nearer toward the point at which all religions meet and blend, then it will state the results of its investigation. But it assumes nothing. It is not Christian, it is not Jew, it is not Romanist, it is not Protestant, it is not Pagan. It is simply human and scientific.

ULTIMATE TRUTH THEIR GOAL.

Mr. Frothingham then, in alluding to the charge made against the Association that they had no definite belief, that they offered nothing to the soul to pin its faith upon, spoke of the changes that are constantly taking place in the creeds of all the churches, and asked,—When you have given Christendom two thousand years, won't you give us a week? Must our hesitancy count against us when its hesitancy is nothing but humility? Will you allow it to stammer when it has been practising all these centuries, and if we stammer a little will you call us fools? We know distinctly what we are about, and we mean to be true to our position, to the world, and to our thought, but modestly, meekly, simply, in all humility, knowing how large a thing science is, knowing how profound a thing philosophy is, casting out our feelers in the meantime with the broadest liberality, calling upon science, philosophy, faith, intuition, the soul, nature, to come in and help us make a faith which shall be satisfactory to the modern working mind.

Individuals of us have their own faith, and it is a very distinct one. We do not pretend that all our faith corresponds. There are newspapers and magazines that represent portions of our faith, but the Free Religious Association is not responsible for them, nor do they seek to fortify themselves by appealing to the Free Religious Association.

Mr. Frothingham then referred in terms of extravagant eulogy to THE INDEX, The Examiner, and The Radical, but declared that neither of them was the organ of the Free Religious Association, nor was the Association responsible for any of their utterances.

He said it was strange that an association that simply places itself outside of all sects, and plants itself upon the religious idea, pure and simple, should be so utterly, completely, and persistently misunderstood and misrepresented. It is said, for instance, to be a company of individuals, discontented people, satisfied with nothing—people who cannot worship with their neighbors, or utter the name of God with their neighbors, or blend their moral or spiritual thoughts with their neighbors, but who must stand apart, so many men and so many women, each one spinning his own little cotweb and imagining that that is the spiritual universe, having no communion, no large sympathy, no feeling for tradition, no sense of brotherhood in the spiritual world. He said, our communion is the largest in the world. We take in all. Our roots go down deeper than those of the world's faith, for we do not stop until we get to human nature, out of which all the faiths have grown. Our sympathies are so broad that we will call no believer a foe, and we would make every believer a friend. But we know no method by which we can strike the depths of the current of this great sympathy, but by sinking the shafts down through our own individual natures.

The speaker then referred to the great Artesian well in Chicago, whose shaft had been sunk twelve hundred feet, through several hundred feet of solid rock, and whose waters, it is said, come from no source nearer than the Rocky Mountains. And so, he said, if you are going to reach the current of the water of life, if you are going to strike the veritable channel of God, you must not go to the little pools that are about here on the surface; you must not even take the larger ponds; you must not even take the grand lakes. You must stand where you are, as individuals, and go down from the point where you stand into this universal human consciousness, which is older than religion, and deeper than all faiths, and broader than all communions, whose foundations are from the unseen spheres, and whose channels run down through all this human nature of ours, beneath all our feet: and nobody knows it except he knows himself.

SOME OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

But it is said: "You are mere speculators. All you care for is searching after truth. There is truth enough in the world, but you don't care to take it. You are people without warmth, without glow, without enthusiasm, with no afflatus." Do you suppose that the workmen who were drilling that shaft in Chicago, who were sinking that Artesian bore, thought any more of the tools they used than that they were tools, and while they were working, did they think of the water that was underneath? And yet they used their tools and nothing but their tools. And any fool or ignoramus that came along might say—"See what stupid men these are, all the time pounding and drilling and sinking a shaft. Why don't they go to the lake and get what water they want? Nothing but hammers and drills." And yet without these they never would have reached the water.

Another complaint is that we are intellectual. What we complain of Christendom is, that it is not. We do use science, philosophy, knowledge, literature, and all the reasoning faculties, and we sharpen them to the keenest point, and we temper them in the hottest flame, and we bear down upon them with the heaviest weights, for we mean to drill and drill until we can strike those great currents of water which are the life of our life. And when we have struck them, we will throw our drills aside and be satisfied with the great draughts of water. But it is our firm persuasion that the drills and the hammers have got to be used for many and many a day yet before they will have done their work.

It is said again that we believe in science, and not in religion. On the contrary, we believe in nothing else but religion. It is the foundation, the source, and the end. What we are seeking is real, pure religion. Science is the method. We know no other. We are not superstitious. We do not cling to tradition. We accept no authority but that of reason. Science is our method, and civilization is our aim—a perfect civilization, a society in which all men and women shall be free in their use of the grandest opportunities and privileges, all welcome to the best there is.

This is the culmination that religion shall come to at last, and any religion that fails of that utterly fails. I do not care how many souls religion can get into a heaven beyond. I can wait for that. The one thing is to know how many souls religion can get into heaven now in this earth of guilt, and misery, and pain, and million-fold wretchedness, and care, and care, and heartbreak, of turpitude and crime. I know of nothing which religion has to do, if it is not to make this world the better worth living in.

It is very strange that the largest believers are commonly reputed no believers at all. If one can say my God, my Savior, my Bible, my soul, my salvation, it is all right. Then he is a profoundly religious man. But let a man stand up and say,—“All men's God, the Universal Father, the Spirit of the World, life of our life, and soul of our soul,”—why he is an atheist. Let a man say,—“Heaven for everybody; doors all open and the latch-string hanging out,”—why, he does not believe in anything. Let a man say,—“No matter about my individual soul, I am for a perfect society,”—why, he is thought to be a man who has no sense of the value of the spiritual interest.

Let a man say that the Bible is plenarily inspired in every phrase and every letter, the only inspired book in all the world, all other literature being secular and profane; the Bible is the soul's book, the Word of God, and the only articulate Word of God; he believes in inspiration. But let a man say, God inspires not priests, but intelligence; God inspires not a paper, but minds; God inspires not a few chapters, but intellect; the inspiration of God comes not here and there to a picked person in Judea, but to human reason whenever and wherever fairly cultivated, honorably and nobly used, why that man does not believe in inspiration at all. The grandest skeptics are those who have seen farther than their companions.

A RADICAL PERORATION.

A friend of mine said in Boston awhile ago, that we believe in human depravity because we do not believe in the absolute perfection of Jesus. On the contrary, those who believe in his absolute, divine perfection, are those who believe in the depravity of human nature. We believe that he was one of the fruits of human nature. And make him as beautiful and as perfect as you will, you only pay the more compliment to the human nature out of which he grew. And, side by side with him, we are delighted to point to the great men of all times, and climes and ages, Zoroaster, and Confucius, and Socrates, and Buddha, as being also children of human nature; as standing by the side of Jesus, by the side of Moses and the great prophets,—one great brotherhood in humanity and in the spirit.

We believe in human nature too much; that is the trouble. And we believe that only in going to human nature with the utmost sincerity shall we get the final word that it articulates, the word of faith, the word that tells us how we may worship the Infinite Spirit in spirit and in truth.

THE REV. MR. TOWNE, OF CHICAGO, SPEAKS.

The Rev. Mr. Towne, of Chicago, was introduced by the Hon. Charles Reemelin.

Religion, he said, not freedom from religion, was the first word of all this free religious movement. All that its leaders asked was that it should have free course.

Man of himself was religious, and it was only fair to let every man be religious in his own way. Whether in the Mosaic or the Moslem form, the Christian form or the Buddhist form, religion was the same flame burning upward in the human heart toward the Highest One.

“What is Judaism?”—a little book written by Dr. Lewin, a Rabbi of New York—told what free religion was, while it said that Judaism was the best form of it for Jews.

The word man is the first word we utter after the word religion. The human sentiments lie at the foundation of free religion. Man was our brother, be he Pagan, Moslem, Jew or Buddhist, and bound to us by this immortal covenant of humanity. This view cut under and cut up all other theologies, because they taught that the covenant of humanity was only binding during a life of probation.

No need was there to open any printed book to learn what was right and what was wrong.

Faith in man first, then faith in duty, and, thirdly, faith in God, were steps in the growth and development of free religion.

He instanced, in illustration of his subject, the statement of Mr. Palgrave, that in the midst of Arabia he found the most splendid specimen of a gentleman he ever saw, in the person of a liberal Arab. Chunder Sen, the liberal Hindu, who now was lecturing in England, was recognized by gentlemen of England as worthy of their admiration and high respect.

The recognition of men as men in religion was the platform of free religion.

FREE DISCUSSION.

After the close of this address, the Rev. Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, announced the programme. He stated that in the discussion of the topics in the programme, a free platform would be given. All who might choose to participate in the discussion, of whatever faith, belief, creed or practice, were cordially invited to take part. It would be taken for granted that persons accepting this invitation would feel themselves bound to conform to the rules and usages governing the deliberations of this body.

WEDNESDAY SESSIONS, NOV. 2.

MORNING SESSION.

The audience yesterday morning was slow in gathering. At the appointed hour, nine o'clock, there were few persons there,—and when the fifty or sixty persons who finally came were on hand, there was some delay occasioned by the non-arrival of the Rev. William J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association, who was expected to open the session with an address or paper on the Unity of Spiritual Freedom, and the opportunity which America offers for its development.

[We omit the abstract of Mr. Potter's essay, which is given elsewhere in full.—ED.]

OTHER REMARKS.

At the conclusion of Mr. Potter, Dr. Curtis, of this city, took the stand and made some remarks, in the main coinciding with those of Mr. Potter, entering somewhat into a scientific exposition of the question, showing the identity of their organism, and claiming, finally, that it was the duty of each and every man to help each and every other man.

Hon. Charles Reemelin followed in some remarks, in the main controverting the idea that America was to overturn everything in the world, and mould it into a common means for the accomplishment of the great ends of humanity. He did not believe that because America was a bag to hold everything, that by merely shaking the bag it would make them all alike. He believed the fountain heads of the principles that were moving the world were principally on the other side of the water. He did not believe that America was to accomplish more than Europe. The Christian religion was not what it was nineteen hundred years ago; not a shred was left of it.

Mr. Rowland Connor, of Milwaukee, said we were to shake up these various theological ideas and make a true religion by taking the real natural elements out of each. The agitation of many of our great questions was for all humanity. We would build up an American religion.

Mrs. Graham, of this city, replied to Mr. Reemelin. She said, though it might be that physical development in America was unequal to Europe, yet she would remind him that there was, after all, an elasticity of step about the poorest boys and girls of this country that could not be found among the peasants of Europe. Though we received our ideas from Europe, they come here for elaboration. Mrs. Graham was manifestly in favor with the audience, for though it was, as a rule, as still as the grave, there were manifest signs of approbation that came well nigh applause.

Prof. Reuss, of Indiana, followed in remarks touching the question, speaking specially of Judaism and its relation to this movement.

At this juncture the Rev. James Challen, of the Christian Church, threw a bombshell into the meeting, by saying the best things had come from Christianity. It was planted on a rock. This grand conglomerate religion talked of would be pure mince meat of the very worst kind. He believed in a miraculous religion, with God for its author. The supernatural belonged to the origin of things. He believed in the principles and precepts of the Bible, and said, if they wanted to have a pure religion, they must go back to a pure Christianity.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The topic for the afternoon session was, "The Battle of Free Religion against Dogmatism and Superstition."

The Rev. F. E. Abbot, of Toledo, opened the discussion.

[The essay is published in full elsewhere.—ED.]

Mr. Towne thought that superstition and dogmatism make of the popular Christian church of to-day a den of thieves and murderers. He used the words in the same sense that Christ used them when he said to the Jews, his co-religionists, that they made of the temple a den of thieves, and when he said that he that loveth not his brother is a murderer. The adherents of the popular Christianity will take a man's living away from him and starve him to death, if he does not subscribe to their doctrines.

In this connection he narrated the persecutions to which he had been subjected in his attempt to establish a classical school near Chicago. He had been driven away because he had been called an infidel.

These things are going on all over the country every day in the name of Jesus. They ought to make that name infamous, and would make it infamous if it were not so enveloped in the broadest, purest, most heavenly charity. This is what he was determined to fight as long as he lived, and with all his might.

A wild Irishman, apparently with a slight touch of lunacy upon him, now ascended the platform, and delivered an impassioned harangue, but exactly what was the drift of his remarks we are unable to say. We don't think he knew himself. We made out, however that he extended an invitation to all to return to the Bible, and take the truth as it is found there, and make their beliefs correspond to that.

Mr. Vickers said they were all used to that kind of talk.

The invitation from the orthodox is,—believe in that which we believe, because it is observed, and you shall be saved. He thought there was at the bottom no real difference between the invitation extended by the Catholic and Protestant Church. The former invites to submit to the authority of an institution which has been established for fifteen or twenty centuries; the latter invites us to submit to the authority of a book, and not of the book alone, but of certain creeds which theologians have constructed from it.

Then there is a party which invites us to leave all creeds and go back to the Bible, pure and simple. This party wholly ignores the composition of the Bible. They wish to go back to primitive Christianity, because it gives a wide latitude for individual interpretation. Now, primitive Christianity is nothing but Judaism. Jesus was a Jew, and never pretended to be anything else. He simply wished to enlarge and clarify some of their ideas. This was the interpretation put upon his work by the earliest disciples, as is shown by the fact that the original Christians insisted that all who came to them from without the Jewish nation must submit to the rite of circumcision as a sign of their submission to Judaism. Over this question arose the first great conflict in the church. Paul, who also came out of Judaism, afterward saw that there was in the teachings of the man Jesus of Nazareth the germ of a broader, more liberal spirit. But primitive Christianity was nothing but Judaism, and they who yearn for it only have to go across the street, and they will find it.

As has been repeatedly said, all religions proceed out of the human soul, and Christianity is but one phase in the religious life of humanity, containing many beautiful things, and containing, also, many horrible things; many things that had greatly assisted in the advancement of the human race, and many that had greatly retarded it. Upon the whole, he thought they could not do better than follow the words of Paul, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

Mr. Challen said the religion of these preachers on the platform was a religion without a Bible, without a Savior, and, he feared, without the God of the universe. They appealed to human reason. Reason is the eye of the soul, but of what use is an eye without light to enable it to see the objects which surround it? Reason is the eye, but Christianity supplies the light, without which the soul would set in darkness.

He was astonished to hear the statement from the platform that primitive Christianity was nothing but Judaism. The primitive Christianity to which he had alluded in the morning session was the apostolic Christianity. He would abandon modern creeds and go back to the religion of the Bible and the religion of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

Mr. Potter said their opponents used their reason to reply to the arguments of the Free Religionists, and thereby showed that they depended upon reason for their foundation. All persons who uphold the superstitions of the church rely upon reason to sustain their superstitions.

He rather objected to the use of the term "free religion," because it might seem to imply the existence of a religious system. In fact, it is but the application of the human reason to religious principle, wherever found and however supported.

He believed the question of the Bible in the schools was a more important one than many supposed, and that one of the most important struggles in our civil history would arise out of that question. The practice is founded solely on superstition, and if they can only break down superstition, the struggle may be averted.

Mr. Frothingham said this phrase—"Free Religious Association"—means simply a religious association—not a literary or philosophical or scientific association, but an association whose members hold themselves free and endeavor to free others to investigate religious truth.

He then proceeded to speak at some length of the superstition which pervades the religious world, and of the necessity that it should be removed before the world could make any substantial progress.

The Convention then adjourned until half-past 7 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Hon. Charles Reemelin opened the discussion with a few brief introductory remarks, in which he explained that the word "man" was used in its general sense, and included both sexes.

[The essay will be found in full elsewhere.—ED.]

A COLLECTION TAKEN.

The Rev. Mr. Vickers spoke of reading a recent German political philosopher, who set forth the reason why the liberalists in religion in Europe failed, as for their want of decision, their disposition to mutual criticism, and their avarice. His duty was, tonight, to ask the liberals of Cincinnati to give and prove that liberalism here was not like that in Europe, for the purpose of printing documents, and keeping up a church on which this collection was taken up.

It was not, in this case, asking a cent for the heathen, and a dollar to send it to them. The Liberal Church had no salaried agents. Every cent contributed would be applied to the purpose for which it was taken up.

A collection was then taken up.

THE DISCUSSION.

The Rev. Mr. W. J. Potter, of New Bedford, Mass., thought that the institution which, in the future, would take the place of the church would be so little like the church of the past that the one would not know the other. Jesus said,—"The time shall come when you shall neither worship in this mountain nor in Jerusalem." Christ went to the synagogue, but not very regularly. When he would worship, he went into a mountain apart, or into the wilderness. He thought Jesus was of the opinion that the coming man would not go to church, and these words and this practice so indicated. The coming Church of Humanity will take charity and philosophy into its very bosom, and this will be its every day work. Church edifices will not be built, and shut up every day in the week except Sunday.

THE REV. MR. TOWNE SPEAKS.

Mr. Towne said John Ruskin says,—"That is the true church where one hand takes another helpfully, and that was the only true mother church that ever was or ever will be." This was true. The social motive was the ruling motive that carried people to this or that particular church, and this last revelation of God was the true foundation upon which to build a church; i. e., the social basis.

We have read that David danced before the Lord. If David would dance now, he would have to go to the basement or to a hall. Let us consecrate all innocent amusements. Use the church for innocent social pleasures. The head of the advanced American church to-day was George William Curtis, the lecturer, and there was a foreshadowing of the future preacher. Of Dickens, he said there was not, in all Christendom, a saint who had done as much for morality as this great, warm, loving heart of his.

REV. MR. CONNOR'S REMARKS.

The Rev. Rowland Connor said he knew of churches in the Puritan city of Boston where the church hall was used for dancing, the ministers participating, while below, in the basement, were members playing euchre and whist. One of these ministers was a very conservative man, and would not, for the world, be seen on this free religious platform. This he spoke of as a sign of the times. Another tendency was toward an unsettled ministry. He knew one society that flourished and had no settled pastor, but employed in succession many different men who had something to tell them.

REV. MR. ABBOT.

The Rev. Mr. Abbot, of Toledo, was sick of the bondage of the profession of a parson, sick of the name church, and wanted to be freed therefrom. In every church there were tabooed questions that were not permitted to be discussed. He would never belong to a church that would ostracise a man for an honest doubt or a sincere faith. If the church could be so modelled as to welcome discussion, where all shades of view could be respected, and all could cooperate in the quest for truth, it would be a means of human advancement such as never yet had been.

REV. MR. VICKERS.

The Rev. Mr. Vickers thought it somewhat remarkable that in all this discussion the element of worship had been left out. He did believe that in the crudest form of human worship that prevailed to-day there was something human and something eternal. The coming church, if it failed to recognize this, would fail to answer a permanent human want, and so failing, would fail. He believed the new spirit of the new church would generate a new worship that would never degenerate into formalism or dogmatism.

This church, he would say, was not built to be kept shut six days in the week and open one day.

Next Sunday it would be dedicated, not to God, but to humanity.

FINIS.

The Rev. O. B. Frothingham, in conclusion, thanked the audience for their attention, the Israelites for the use of their temple, and this society for the use of its edifice, and pronounced the Convention closed.—Cincinnati Gazette.

THE ATTACKS ON CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

LETTER FROM PRESIDENT WHITE.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:—

It is not altogether pleasant to feel that very many earnest fellow-citizens of ours have been really induced to believe that we at Ithaca are pagans—haters of Christianity—laboring to overthrow it or undermine it.

Will you permit me, in the interest not only of the institution but of the public, to lay before your readers a simple statement regarding these attacks in the organs of various sects and colleges?

At the outset, I would call attention to the following facts:—

First—There has never been a public exercise of any sort whatever, whether inauguration, commencement, or laying corner-stone, which has not been opened and closed with prayer; and it has happened that in every case the person officiating has been a clergyman in good and regular standing in an Orthodox Christian Church.

I say happened; because I will frankly say that if at any such exercise a noble heretic had been present, whether named Beecher, or Bellows, or Chapin, or Hale, or Hyacinthe, he would have been asked to take part just as readily as another of faith more generally approved.

Secondly—Every plan of the buildings ever made has embraced a University chapel; and though the present room has proved not large enough, the new one now building will, we trust, be sufficient.

Thirdly—Not a working day has there been since the organization of the University which has not been opened with reading of the Scriptures and with Christian supplication in the chapel—including that noblest of all petitions, that one whose origin is shown by the fact that it cannot be bettered or perverted or made sectarian—and whose applicability to human wants is shown by the fact that all men can join in it, and that large numbers of our students do earnestly join in it: the Lord's Prayer.

Fourthly—A Young Men's Christian Association has been formed, which, young as it is, is second to that of no other college in vigor and earnestness; and regular services are held by it in a room appropriated to it in the University buildings.

Fifthly—Not less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, besides Mr. Cornell's endowments, have been given to the institution during the past year for various purposes, and an additional sum of from fifty to sixty thousand dollars is pledged to us, and all of it, as far as I know, from earnest, Christian men and women, who had examined into our work so closely and whose consciences approved it so thoroughly that they made these gifts freely and without solicitation.

I might make further statements to show what little ground there is for the pleasant epithets that have been lavished upon us; such as irreligious, unreligious, Godless, etc., etc., but the above are sufficient for the present.

So much for the University in general; a word now for the Faculty.

From the day when Mr. Cornell's offer was made, there have been a few persons eager in scenting out heresy. Before a stone was laid or an officer chosen, it was hinted that the institution was to be dangerous. The same bitterness was shown against it which was shown against Oberlin College, now widely known as an evangelical stronghold.

As soon as a word was uttered, the open war began. The President of the University had the honor to be first attacked. Words were put into his mouth which he never uttered, words were suppressed which he had uttered, and reports were circulated that he was very unsound, although at that very time he was a trustee of Hobart College and professor elect in Yale College—two institutions whose "soundness" will hardly be brought into question.

Professor Agassiz was denounced, although every scientific man knows him to be the great bulwark of the Church against the Darwinian development theory. He was attacked for those very doctrines regarding creation which are now conceded in the orthodox book of the Rev. Dr. Thompson.

Professor Goldwin Smith was also attacked, although one of the most self-sacrificing and truly religious of men, and a communing church member.

Professors George William Curtis and James Russell Lowell were attacked, although their lectures were purely literary; and, to cap the climax, heresy was detected in the earnest prayer at recent public exercises, though made by a pastor whose orthodoxy was never before questioned, and who is a trustee of one of the most venerable evangelical colleges in the land.

Our Resident Faculty have fared no better. Though selected from the leading Christian Colleges of various denominations; though all bore the highest commendations from the faculties of those institutions; though all, so far as I know, are members of or attendant upon Christian churches, portions of the community have been led to believe that these men are plotting against Christianity.

Of all this, sir, I make not the slightest complaint. Those of us who have pledged our lives and fortunes to this building up of what we think a better and broader university education expected such attacks—and perhaps they are the most sure signs that the work is going on well. We simply commend these facts to every thoughtful man and woman.

The Index.

NOVEMBER 19, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Persons wishing a file of THE INDEX, bound and complete for the year, at $2 50, will please forward name and address immediately. No money should be enclosed. Only two HUNDRED AND FIFTY COPIES can be supplied. If these are all ordered, the missing numbers will be reprinted and the orders filled at the end of the year. For further particulars see THE INDEX, No. 20.

We give up all our available space this morning to the best reports we have of the late Conventions of the Free Religious Association, which, even with the aid of our SUPPLEMENT, must be continued in our next issue. All the essayists but one have kindly favored us with their manuscripts, which we shall print as soon as possible; and there would have been no exception at all, if a brother editor in Cincinnati had not refused us a courtesy which we should cheerfully have shown him in like circumstances.

The effect of these Conventions, attended by large audiences at each evening session, and by a fair number even in the busiest hours of the day, has been to deepen our conviction of the reality of a vast religious revolution now going on in the hearts of the people. Never were assemblies more attentive, or apparently unwearied; and their faces told a tale of the most earnest questioning after truth. We are thankful to have had this educating experience. Never again can we doubt the value of our work, to which we count it a privilege to give every energy.

The letter of LUCRETIA MOTT, whose heart and hand have been with every good cause for so many years, and the expression of whose sympathy was received by the audience in Toledo with such applause as is yielded only to great services and great worth, shows how the noblest instincts of the age are enlisted in this work of religious reform. Her words of good cheer are a benediction to the younger workers who have learned to venerate her with a veneration which can be accorded to but few.

The narrow space at our command forbids us to follow strictly a chronological order in publishing our matter; but we do the best we can under the circumstances. The essays of Mr. Vickers and Miss Peckham, together with the reports of the Indianapolis and Toledo Conventions, are excluded from the present number of THE INDEX by their length.

On our third page will be found the letter of President White to which allusion is made in our essay on "The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition."

A LETTER FROM LUCRETIA MOTT.

PHILADELPHIA, 10th mo. 31, 1870.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

My Dear Friend,—Thy letter of invitation to your Free Religious Meeting was received while I was in New York, and forwarded to me.

I could not answer it until my return, not knowing my children's decision as to going to Chicago this Fall. They now say business at home will prevent their going. Toledo was to be visited on the way, and I hoped to accompany them, not being able to travel alone.

Your meeting would be a strong attraction. Those I have attended in Boston have been greatly interesting, and I doubt not are producing good fruit. Theological errors need to be met thus, and a higher righteousness advocated. The kingdom or government of truth—of God—as inwardly revealed, is superior to any mediation or authority.

Good works the rightful evidence of sound faith. The infidelity mostly to be feared a doubt of the sufficiency of this faith to remove mountains of error and wrong.

By faith slavery has been abolished; now determine that the barbarism and giant evil of war shall be overcome, and it shall be done unto us.

Woman is rising above the disabilities of centuries; the laborer is beginning to be deemed "worthy of his hire." Intemperance still slays its thousands, but the friends of that cause are unwearied in their appeals and in their example.

Education is spreading everywhere, so that we may hope there will be not only high-sounding—"Glory to God in the highest"—but—"peace on earth and good will to men."

I never yet wrote a letter to be read in any meeting. I am only sorry that I can't be with you. I enclose a little contribution.

Thy sincere friend,

LUCRETIA MOTT.

THE BATTLE OF FREE RELIGION WITH DOGMATISM AND SUPERSTITION.

[An Essay by F. E. Abbot, read at the Cincinnati and Indianapolis Conventions of the American Free Religious Association.]

Whoever bestows even a moderate degree of attention upon the tendencies and movements of the age, is struck with a universally prevalent restlessness of mind. All things seem to be tossing on a vast ocean of change. In all its aspects, society appears to be undergoing the throes of revolution. Nothing is fixed. Government, commerce, philosophy, science, religion,—in every department of human activity and thought, old precedents are overthrown, old theories unsettled, old institutions and old ideas shaken to their foundations. What does it all mean? Is it possible, while still bewildered by the whirl and half-stunned by the roar of modern life, to discover a "method in its madness," or trace the working of any large law in this utter chaos of innovation?

I think it is. In whatever direction I look, I seem to see the same essential fact repeating itself, though under an infinite variety of forms,—the same essential law at work, creating phenomena as diverse as night and day, and as numberless as the sands of the sea. Briefly put, the law is this, that humanity must be developed, and that it can only be developed by the free exercise of its own native faculties.

"That seems a very simple statement," you may say; "nobody disputes that."

On the contrary, everybody disputes it,—if not in word, at least in act. Nobody believes it to the extent of carrying it out in practice. I have scarcely met a man who had enough faith in it to keep his hands off his neighbor in all respects, and concede to others the same liberty we are all so quick to claim for ourselves. And here lies the explanation of the warfare going on throughout the world—namely, humanity can only be developed freely, and yet men lack faith in freedom. The past had faith in Power; the future will have faith in Reason; the present has a divided faith in both, and is therefore at war with itself.

What is the secret of all this seething and tumult in politics, national and international, the world over? Is it anything, at bottom, but the effort of mankind to throw off the old systems of government, which were all based on the idea of brute force—"might is right," as the saying is,—and to establish in their stead forms of government which shall simply let men alone? Point me, if you can, to the government in the past which has not rested on this principle that Power, however acquired, is "king by the grace of God." Even in democratic Athens and Rome, the will of the majority was irresponsible and supreme; and it is a modern idea that even the will of the majority has no jurisdiction over the individual, so long as the individual forbears to trespass against others. All governments in the past have been simple embodiments of Power, arbitrary Power, making no appeal to Reason, but declaring sternly—"Do this because I will it." And the entire political struggle of to-day, whether appearing in the domestic administrations or the foreign wars of the nations, is an effort to get rid of this predominance of brute force. The world wants to be let alone, that humanity may adjust itself freely and rationally to the natural conditions of happiness. When it succeeds in making this idea of liberty the basis of all government, whose sole function as such is to protect liberty, we shall have seen the last of political revolutions.

Now I might multiply illustrations of this law that humanity can only be developed by the free exercise of its native faculties, and show how it is creating everywhere struggle and commotion. Commerce is distracted with questions of Free Trade and Protection, Labor and Capital, Competition and Co-operation, all turning at last on the same pivotal question—"How can we substitute REASON for POWER?" Science, art, literature, philosophy, religion,—all departments of human activity exhibit the same struggle, each seeking to secure freedom from the arbitrary sway of great reputations and of systems of thought which rest upon them. Coming slowly to a consciousness of its own right to grow, the human mind is pecking its way out of the shell, and proposes to dismiss the old hen of Authority from all further service of incubation.

There is, then, a battle going on between the expanding mind of man and the various influences that repress its development. It is a war in which every man with a soul above that of a grasshopper must be profoundly interested. We are brutes until we can get out of the narrow circle of our private interests, and merge these in the universal interests of mankind. The horse is happy, completely happy, when he is served with his supper of oats or hay. How much better is a man who cares only for heaping up a fortune? The difference is that the horse is content with his supper alone, while the man wants a house, servants, silver plate and bank account attached to it. They are equally selfish; and the horse has the advantage, inasmuch as his wants, being fewer, are more easily gratified. Hence I hold that the warfare I speak of concerns us all. I wish to show that this universal conflict is substantially a conflict between Free Religion, on the one hand, and Dogmatism and Superstition, on the other hand.

If I am allowed to assume as correct this idea of Religion—namely, that it is simply the effort of mankind to develop itself to the highest possible degree,—I need not waste a word in proving that, so far as the human mind struggles to expand and develop itself, it is to that extent religious; nor in proving that the real foe to the repressive influences of the past is itself religion. The word "Free" does but express what is thus implied in the very word "Religion;" and would be superfluous, were it not that religion has been associated with the narrowness and follies of various artificial systems of thought and life. Waiving at present all defence of my definition of religion, which I have elsewhere defended, I wish to show that "Dogmatism and Superstition" are the other party to the universal warfare of the times.

Now what is Superstition? In a very able discourse on this subject, Rev. O. B. Frothingham recently said:—

"The German philosopher, Kant, hit the matter more near the vital core, when he said—'Superstition is the habit of regarding nature, and natural powers and influences, as being subject to capriciousness, as being unregulated by law.' Superstition is the disregard of law in the natural and in the metaphysical world; in the world of matter and of mind. It is the substitution of fancy for thought, of imagination for reason. It is the subordination of reflection to feeling; the blind submission of ignorance to arbitrary and external authority; the looking off to preternatural or supernatural powers for the help that can come only by natural means. There the mark is hit directly in the centre."

With this view of the question I substantially agree; and I should only supplement it by suggesting that superstition does not consciously deny or disregard law, of which it has not even formed a conception, but rather pays no heed to what it knows nothing about. In essence, it is more positive than negative, and might be defined as faith in irrational Power, that is, Power undirected by Reason. It believes, and believes intensely; but what it believes in is a Power which acts irrationally, whether by mere blind chance, as what is called "luck," or by wilfulness and caprice, as for instance the gods of the Pagan and Christian mythologies.

It is for this reason that the friends of despotism are always friends of superstition. If a man or a nation is taught to believe in Power simply as Power, regardless of the reasonableness with which it acts, he or it is in just the frame of mind to comply with the injunction of Paul—"Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." [Rom. xiii. 1-2.] These verses strike the key-note both of superstition and of tyranny, and show the intimate connection between these two. He who reverences power as such, and obeys it simply because it is power, is a slave in body and soul. But he who never obeys any power without being convinced of its right to rule and its reasonableness in ruling,—who would rebel, like Prometheus, against the very God of Heaven, should he violate the laws of reason or right,—this man is free, and the very person that tyrants make haste to get rid of. The connection between slavery and superstition is not accidental, nor the connection between freedom and knowledge. At the root of every bondage lies superstition, reverence for Power divorced from Reason; for without this reverence in the hearts of the people, no despot, whether political or spiritual, could reign an hour. How, then, can you destroy slavery, without destroying superstition, the cause of all slavery? People fail to perceive that reverence for official power as such, whether in kings or county officers, is exactly the same in kind as dread of witches and sorcerers and angry gods. They differ only in degree.

Superstition, therefore, I define as faith in irrational Power—Power that either acts or may act irrationally, without thereby losing its hold on human veneration and obedience. Next, what is Dogmatism?

Dogmatism is half-rationalized superstition. By this I mean that the dogmatist accepts the premises of superstition, and builds up a system on them. The authorities on which he relies have no reason to back them—they simply appeal to superstitious faith. For instance, the Bible exerts a vast influence over the minds of multitudes. Ask one of these believers in its authority why he believes, and he can give you no reason. "It is the Word of God," he says. "But how do you know that?" "Because," he replies, "the Bible itself says so." Nor can you get any farther with him. The authority of the Bible is proved by itself; in other words, it remains unproved. It has no reason whatever to rest on, but only a blind, unquestioning, superstitious veneration for a de facto power. On this basis of unreason, the dogmatist constructs a system of doctrines which, likely enough, are logically strung together and well reasoned out,—having, of course, no real value, because built on delusion. The Bible is a despot whose throne has no foundation but a dream, an hallucination, a reverence for claims which exert enormous power, but make appeal to blind faith rather than to reason. And the dogmas drawn from it have no proof but an appeal to this actual yet usurping authority.

The essence of all dogma is assertion without proof; and dogmatism knows well how to cover up the weakness of its first principles by a vast array of logical deductions. This only serves to magnify and multiply the falsehoods with which it starts. The "divine right of kings" was a dogma which served as the bulwark of tyranny for long centuries, since behind it rose a vast structure of regal and enslaving pretensions. In every case, Dogmatism takes the crude Superstition of the people, and elaborates it into an edifice, often constructed with surpassing ability, which ends by becoming a Bastille for the human mind. It thus adds a terrible power to ignorance, by organizing it into a system and using it in the interest of despotic authority. It is, in fact, a most dangerous alliance of reason with unreason which is vastly more powerful than unreason alone, since over a vast mass of superstition it throws the cloak of philosophical rigor. The evil is thus only aggravated, and rendered far more difficult of extinction. In the crude state, Superstition is mainly a matter of feeling, and can be remedied by instruction; but Dogmatism, becoming intellectual in form, grows stubborn and bitter against the light, and remains hide-bound to the end. Arrogant, hard, and implacable, it does infinite mischief by preventing the illuminations of Science from reaching the mind, and thus does its terrible best to keep the world in the dark.

Now that a bitter and deadly warfare is waged between these twin devils, Superstition and Dogmatism, and Free Religion, is plain enough. But like every other warfare on a higher than the material plane, it is invisible to multitudes, even to many radicals. Trade goes on, the streets are thronged, no signs of blood are detected; and, blinded by pre-occupation, many free-thinkers underrate the importance of this warfare. They say the country is well enough, nobody is bound at the stake, and the popular superstition is practically harmless; hence they discourage all agitation, and turn away with indifference from the work of enlightening the people by the dissemination of liberal ideas. Such men are simply as blind as bats. They fail to perceive that the enormous mass of the popular superstition crushes society, and keeps the world in a semi-barbarous condition. They lie paralyzed beneath the pressure, and do not dream that they themselves are victims of the very evil they deny or extenuate.

George Henry Lewes, in his "Physiology of Common Life" [vol. 1, p. 302], says that in England the public is daily becoming more enlightened on the subject of ventilation, though a dangerous indifference, springing from a want of elementary knowledge, is still prevalent, and taxes the patience of reformers; but that in Germany, it is painful to observe that even cultivated men seem almost insensible to the importance of fresh air. He refers to a fact which is familiar to us all, that by remaining in a close and hot room we become so accustomed to the foul atmosphere as not to be aware of its condition until we leave the room and re-enter it. Instead of being unharmed by this unconscious breathing of vitiated air, all the organic functions are depressed, and the entire system is enfeebled; and the only escape from death is the restoration that accompanies a change of air.

Now what is true of the body, is just as true of the mind. We cannot inhale a foul mental or moral atmosphere without paying the penalty. We cannot get so accustomed to it as not to receive great injury. Yet the superstitions of the people vitiate the air of society to an extent so great that multitudes of persons, themselves liberal in opinion, are half asphyxiated with timidity, dare not say their souls are their own, and never venture to utter their heresies except with bated breath in a corner, with nervous glances over their shoulder all the while. These are the very persons who seem to have the greatest faith in the harmlessness of the popular follies of belief,—the utter innocuousness of the atmosphere that is suffocating their manhood. They are gradually depleted of their courage and sincerity, yet remain apparently unconscious of their own moral deterioration.

Now it is not best to submit to this state of things without at least a protest. The house we live in wants ventilation; the air is foul with superstition and dogmatic folly. I mean, if I can, to raise a window, or, if I can't, to break it. The health of the company is worth more than all the glass. A stream of the cool, fresh air of common sense would wonderfully refresh these pale, narrow-chested people who now daily draw into their lungs air that is only fit for a stable. The habit of inhaling superstition is ruinous, if long continued. It is every man's interest to get good ventilation; and the only way to get it is to let the pure out-door breezes of truth sweep freely through society. The mental atmosphere is to-day heavy and foul; and the world wants nothing so much as thorough ventilation. The tone of our whole character suffers from the carbonic acid of superstition which we cannot help breathing more or less; nor is its evil influence any less real because we are so accustomed to it as scarcely to be conscious of it. The dogmas which it supports deprive us of all the countless benefits which would accrue to us from a higher state of civilization. We live in an atmosphere of ignorance and fear,—ignorance of the most vitally important truths, fear of the beneficial effects these truths would produce. Even if we ourselves are to some extent enlightened and courageous, we are far less so than we should be, did we not have to be fighting all the while against the darkness and the timidity that prevail. Mankind are so bound together that no one can help suffering from the evils that harm society as a whole; and neither you nor I are so thoroughly human, such well developed men and women as we should be, if Superstition and Dogmatism did not stand in the way of a true civilization. We are forced to assume an antagonistic attitude towards the fears and follies of our times; and I must confess that this very antagonism, necessary as it is, and a lesser evil than politic submission, is unfavorable to the sweet and genial spirit that is part of the noblest character.

This reaction upon ourselves, if nothing else, makes the superstitions of other people a positive harm to us, besides simply depriving us of the advantages for culture and character we might otherwise enjoy. We have to grow in an impoverished soil; the conditions of high development do not exist; we are debarred from the inestimable good that would come to us from living in a period of universal enlightenment, and from breathing an atmosphere of universal freedom, courage and superior knowledge. Even if we care only for ourselves and our children, we have every motive that can appeal to human selfishness, to seek the destruction of superstition and the establishment of a better state of things. But if to these selfish motives we add the nobler impulses that should urge us to seek the good of all our fellow-men, surely it becomes in the highest degree a duty to throw our best powers into this cause of spiritual emancipation, and to do the utmost possible for the triumph of Free Religion over Superstition and Dogmatism. The fruits of victory will surpass our wildest dreams; and though we may not, nay, cannot live to behold them all, we shall but discharge a high and divine obligation by helping to make the world we dwell in a garden, well watered and enriched with generous soil, for the growing of a fair and fine Humanity.

If any one is still skeptical concerning the enormous power of superstition in our own country, which we are all accustomed to hear lauded as thoroughly enlightened and free from it, I ask him to consider candidly the condition of our educational institutions. Education, if untrammelled, is the greatest, nay, the only corrective of superstition. But if not untrammelled—if perverted to the service of superstition itself,—it becomes the greatest agency for perpetuating it, and keeping the human mind in darkness. Let the man who is himself liberal and at the same time indifferent or skeptical as to the harm done by superstition in America, scrutinize the actual condition of our schools and colleges, and he will see abundant reason for untiring and active exertion for the spiritual emancipation of this country.

Not to mention the Catholic schools of the country, which we all know to be managed with the express purpose of planting Catholic superstition in the minds of children, the determined efforts of Protestants to enforce Bible-reading in the common schools, which are supported by taxes levied from the whole people, have been thus far crowned with success. The protests against this injustice in Cincinnati have been thus far fruitless. Why? Because the public mind is so steeped in superstition that it cannot perceive any injustice in perverting public funds to the support of Bible-worship. Men who put the Bible on a level with all other books are compelled to pay their money to uphold the notion that the Bible is the "Word of God," and therefore above all other books. Children are thus inoculated, so far as Bible-reading can inoculate them, with superstition. The real cause of this outrage is the superstition which is entrenched in public opinion.

Furthermore, in very large portions of this country, no teacher, however competent, can secure employment in the common schools unless he or she believes in the popular theology. It so happens that the best teachers, those most competent to instruct and wisely educate the young, are usually disbelievers in this theology. The consequence is that Protestant schools are not only kept crude and imperfect, but are actually perverted to the inculcation of the most arrant superstition. This is no fancy picture. Even in Massachusetts, an admirable teacher was lately dismissed from a State Institution, simply and solely because he was not "Evangelical," i. e. Orthodox. The chaplain of the State Reform School at Westboro', in the same State, recently published an appeal for fifteen more teachers in his Sunday School, in which, although he is supported by money paid by liberals as well as Christians, he makes this public avowal of his perversion of this money to the support of superstition:—

"It will be highly proper to say that I do not wish to be understood as making an indiscriminate call for teachers, without regard to their character or fitness. We are needing converted teachers. We would not especially urge any but converted teachers to take classes, for 'if the blind lead the blind, will they not both fall into the ditch?' The boys cannot certainly be benefited by the instruction of infidels. The scorner, the doubter, and those who are commonly known as non-professing Christians, we will very willingly excuse. Intelligence and discernment may be well employed in increasing the resources and glory of earthly kingdoms, but the highest order of learning can contribute nothing to the glory of God's spiritual kingdom, unless it includes also a knowledge of the 'Divine science of saving immortal souls.'"

Now the bigoted and unjust discrimination in public teachers on account of their religious belief has the effect in many ways of keeping education at a low ebb. Science is not honestly taught by "Evangelical" or "converted" teachers, but is twisted and belied to make it tally with the Bible. Enlightenment is corrupted at its very source. The text-books adopted by such teachers are filled with deliberate falsifications of fact, in the interest of orthodoxy. Thus the superstition which causes the employment of these teachers is perpetuated in turn by their mistaken or dishonest instructions. Whoever will take the trouble to examine the books used in our public schools will find my assertion abundantly substantiated.

Nor is it only in the lower schools that superstition thus poisons the very foundations of knowledge. Our academies, high schools, and colleges are to a great extent under the same injurious influences. No person, however competent to teach or however distinguished in his special department of science or learning, can be appointed as professor in a single American college or university, if he is publicly known to be skeptical in his views of Christianity. Almost all our colleges are under denominational control, and are secretly governed by the narrowest and most sectarian objects. They are managed by Evangelical ministers, and devoted to the manufacture of more of the same sort. Their primary object, the object which secures them the money-support of their respective sects, is not education, but the propagation of sectarian superstitions. I assert with the utmost deliberation that there is not a single school, high school, academy, college, or university on this continent, which is really free from the depressing and embarrassing influence of public superstition. Even Harvard and Yale, even the University of Michigan and Cornell University, are at this moment afraid to employ a professor who is under its ban. They all have professors who secretly disbelieve the orthodox theology, and may be no more Christian than myself; their views may be known to their private friends, and in a narrow circle of acquaintances. But I challenge denial of the statement that no man can be appointed to a professorial chair in any American university, who is well known to the public at large as a non-Christian. Public superstition would keep away such large numbers of students, that no college faculty in the land dares to incur its frown. The result is that instruction is restricted, the true and fearless spirit of science is repressed, and the enlightenment of mankind is retarded. This is the plain and unvarnished truth. To her shame be it said, America has not one college or university which is really free. Public superstition puts learning itself into fetters, forbids science to apply its own fundamental principle of the immutability of natural laws, and persecutes that very spirit of free and fearless inquiry which alone can complete the edifice of American liberty.

Perhaps you doubt the truth of these statements of mine. Let me give you a single illustration.

If ever a university has made profession of perfect independence of public opinion with regard to theological beliefs, it is certainly Cornell University. It was declared at the start, that appointments to professorships would be made without regard to the theological belief of the applicants, but that the administration of the university would keep itself free from all sectarian influences. Doubtless these professions were made in perfect good faith; but they could not be carried out into practice, because public superstition forbade. Although in the appointment of professors the promised impartiality was not observed, the Christian public have nevertheless remained unsatisfied; attack after attack has been made on the college for its theological unsoundness, and the bitterest abuse heaped on the officers for their alleged hostility to Christianity. So fierce did the assaults become, that President White, himself a man of the largest and most liberal culture, who, I doubt not, would be glad to make Cornell as free as any German university, was stung into making a defence of the college government which, I confess, it grieved me to see. In order to repel the charge that he and his associates were, in his own words, "haters of Christianity," he declares that—

1. There has never been in the college a public exercise of any sort whatever, whether inauguration, commencement, or laying corner-stone, without public prayer by a clergyman in good and regular standing in an Orthodox Christian Church; though a liberal Christian might, if present, have been asked to take part.

2. A chapel is part of the proposed plan of the University buildings, and one is now constructing.

3. Every day is begun with reading from the Scriptures and "Christian" prayer.

4. A Young Men's Christian Association has been formed, and a room assigned it in the University buildings.

5. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been given to the college, and fifty or sixty thousand more pledged, by "earnest, Christian men and women" who have become satisfied of its real Christian character.

Now that the President of a great University, devoted simply and solely to education, should be obliged thus to cater to jealous orthodoxy, and defend his work by the plea that it is thoroughly Christian, is a proof of the reality and power of public superstition that no liberal man can dispute. It is a disgrace to America. I am very far from judging President White harshly because he has thus bent the knee before the great spiritual tyranny of the land; perhaps he could do no otherwise, though certain I am that some would refuse to do what he did in the matter, cost what it might to the University. I sincerely pity a liberal man who feels himself forced to such public self-humiliation; and I only refer to it now as a signal proof of the reality and activity of a great public superstition in America, which makes impossible a really free education and a really high civilization. Not till this superstition is destroyed in the public mind, will our country take a front rank in the world, or our people become worthy of their own Declaration of Independence.

The grave fact is that Christianity, organized intellectually into a great dogmatic system, organized socially into a great ecclesiastical system, is itself, notwithstanding the services it has rendered, and to some extent is still rendering, the vast organic Superstition of the age. It is the source of all minor superstitions, which only as parts of it are able to retain their hold on the public mind. It is responsible for all this hindrance to the advancement of the race to which I have referred; and so long as it reigns over the public mind and heart, just so long will America feel the benumbing and paralyzing influence of Superstition dogmatically, socially and ecclesiastically established. It is the task of to-day to overthrow this enormous superstructure of spiritual tyranny, and establish in its stead a free, enlightened commonwealth, whose corner-stone shall be freedom, education, and human brotherhood,—in a word, FREE RELIGION.

THE WORK OF RADICALISM IN INDIANA.

[An Essay read by Col. J. O. Martin at the Indianapolis Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

What should the Liberals of Indiana do? Our friends from the hills of New England have come to bring us the ripe fruit of their study and thought, to join the experience and culture of the east to the young, vigorous and progressive ideas of the west, to help us to develop the Liberalism of Free Religion in Indiana. We stretch out our hands to them and give them a hearty Western welcome to the Railroad City—the capital of Indiana. We thank them for coming and hope the good fruit of their work will afford them compensation. While we listen to the messages that they bring us, and while we are roused with enthusiasm for the great cause which these friends represent, let us see how we can be permanently benefited by this Convention. Let us see what we can and what we ought to do for ourselves as citizens of Indiana.

Indianapolis is near the centre of the great State of Indiana with its population of nearly two millions. The vast agricultural and mineral resources of the State are just beginning to be developed. The vast social, moral, and intellectual powers of its people are rapidly developing. On all sides are school-houses and colleges for the education of our children, and the number and elegance of our churches would indicate, to a casual observer, that ample preparation is being made for the religious training and development of the people.

With the exception of a few Jewish Synagogues, these churches are all called Christian, and nearly all of them Evangelical or Orthodox Christian.

There is, I believe, but one Unitarian Church or Society in the State—eight or ten Universalist Churches, all small and poorly supported—here and there a little association of Spiritualists or Hicksite Quakers, or a little club of Free Thinkers. These are the only organizations for religious worship or culture outside of the Orthodox and Catholic Churches in the State.

All this would indicate that the people of Indiana are pretty well satisfied with the existing churches. This, however, I am satisfied, is not the case. On the contrary, a large portion of the best educated, most philanthropic, and most religious of our people have outgrown the churches. This is true of many excellent people inside of the churches, as well as of the better class of the "world's people."

These people (and their name is legion) have become thoroughly satisfied that the doctrines, creeds, dogmas, and theories of these churches are false—that they are derogatory to God and injurious to man—and that, if the churches ever met the wants of humanity they do not and cannot do it to-day. Science and literature, religion and philanthropy, are rapidly increasing the numbers of this class of people.

Our first duty, then, it seems to me, is to organize. The great ideas that have moved the world forward and elevated humanity have at first been possessed by a few minds; at last men have organized around those ideas, which have then become a power in the world. So it seems to me that we who believe in Free Religion or Liberal Christianity should organize on a basis so broad and comprehensive that it may embrace all who desire to reach a higher and better development for man than has been reached in the past. Wherever there is an organization already existing that comes nearly up to our standard, it is, I think, wisest for us to help it in its work rather than to organize anew. Every city, village or hamlet in the State that has no liberal organization should form one. I am satisfied that there is not a place of two hundred inhabitants in Indiana, in which sufficient good material may not be found for such an organization.

These societies, when formed, should communicate with each other and exchange ideas. They should seek for truth wherever it is to be found; but they should not be satisfied with the possession of abstract truth. They should be very practical. Before they tear down the old, they should be sure of building something better. In short, they should be sure that they can do more good than any church in the vicinity can do.

The press and the platform should be made powerful engines in this work. Take Abbot's INDEX or Towne's EXAMINER. There is more intellectual and religious pabulum in a single number of either of these, than a dozen orthodox papers or ministers can give.

The next thing that we should look to is education—full, thorough, and comprehensive education. Teach the boy science and mathematics, and he will discover a theology for himself. But he will be very unorthodox. The clear and established facts of science are giving us a revelation far nobler and truer than all the pagan and Christian theologies of the past. Humboldt's calm Cosmos is taking the place of Moses' little Garden of Eden. The truths of Geology have destroyed the fictions of Genesis. Science has unveiled the laws of the physical universe, which were never revealed to Jesus or his apostles, and has shown that the miracles said to have been performed by them were simply impossible, and that the men who recorded these stories were mistaken. Ignorance is our greatest enemy—science our best friend. The student must be a free thinker. He cannot believe in science and the theology of the churches; but he must believe in science,—he knows it is true.

Strike on with your hammers, Geologists, till you break through the six days of creation! Strike on till you show the world the foot-prints of the creation in the old red sandstone and the marble tomb of the corals. Open the great book and show us what God has written upon the rocky tables of the ages—written for all men to read as he never wrote for Moses on Sinai.

Gaze on through your miraculous tubes, ye Astronomers, and show us the wonders of that mighty universe that moved in its sublime course so far beyond the vision of the prophets and psalmist, and we will say with the psalmist that "the Heavens declare the glory of God."

Go on with your investigations, students of history, till you can give us the facts of human experience in the past as far as they have been recorded. Separate these facts from the Jewish and pagan legends and mythologies, so that the minds of men shall no longer be weakened and beclouded by mistaking the simple nonsense of the Jewish and Persian dreams for the word of God. If these legends are deemed worthy of preservation, put them in a book by themselves. Let men see them as they are, with no cloud to cover them from the day and they will discover their hideous deformity. Men will then learn that God's revelations are constant and eternal and that only the vast universe can contain His word. As Liberals we should take hold of the great social questions of the day which are ignored by the Churches. We should make our definition of politics "God's law applied to human government." We should then put religion into our politics and purified politics into our religion. We should labor to remove from our statute books those unjust laws which deprive one-half of our fellow citizens of all political rights. We should stand for exact and equal justice for all men and all women. We should oppose war as the greatest wrong which one people can possibly inflict upon another. By teaching the absolute brotherhood of all men we should help to educate men up to so high a moral standard that they will never consent, under any circumstances, to take the life of a brother man. In all great questions of reform and progress we must be leaders. The church and the clergy will never dare to lead. Yet they will follow, though with halting step and averted gaze. They will at last learn to trust in God and man; and when the moss-grown walls which the ignorance, superstition and wickedness of the church of the past have built up in the path of human progress are broken down by the battering rams of free thought, they will shed a few tears over the ruins—then they will rejoice with us and say, "What wonderful things God has wrought!" I try to forget that these shepherds of Israel, these self-appointed servants of God and professed followers of the good and loving Jesus stood up so long and so strongly for slavery, and that they found so many texts in the Bible to prove that it was right. I thank God that infidelity to the churches, but fidelity to God and man, was strong enough to break the shackles of four millions of my countrymen. But I love to remember that there were a few noble exceptions to this rule. I love to remember how heartily the church and the clergy endorsed liberty when it became an accomplished fact—how heartily they endorsed the doctrines of the reformers when they could not do otherwise, while we stretched out the hand of a brother to the poor, the ignorant, the oppressed, the abandoned and the criminal. Let us be very charitable to these men with priestly robes. If we believe that these men have been false to their age and false to humanity, and hence false to religion and to God, let us strive to be truer men and to do better than they have done. As I look back over the pages of history and see how Christians have butchered each other and are butchering each other to-day—as I turn the pages of these eighteen centuries of Christian history and find almost every page dotted with figures numbering those slain by Christians—as I see the pages of this long, long history stained with the blood of millions of God's children slain by Christians, I think that the blood of the martyrs has indeed been the seed of the church. When I see the tear stains which the oppressions and cruelties of this Christian church has left upon the sad faces of this long line of humanity—when I see the fetter marks upon the limbs of my fellow men made by chains forged by Christian hands—when I see my fellow men imprisoned in dungeons, suffering cruel and vindictive punishments resulting from the wicked creeds of the churches—when I see all these great wrongs that have been heaped upon humanity in the past and many of them continued in the present in lands called Christian, and find that the Christian church, as an organization, has never raised its voice against them or in defence of the rights of man—when I find that its anointed ministers have been so busy with their creeds and dogmas, so anxious to save men from an imaginary hell in the future, that they have calmly plunged them into a real hell here—when I learn from the history of the past that nearly all great reforms have been begun and carried on by men called infidels by the churches, and against all the organized power of these churches—when I see what a whited sepulchre this Christianity has been of dead men's bones, what a failure it has been and how short it has come of meeting the wants of humanity, I can understand why it is that earnest and sincere men like our friend Abbot have scholars. Men who believe in God and love their fellow-men should say, "This will not do. We must have something higher and better than this Christianity." On the other hand I find men equally earnest and sincere, glowing with philanthropy, men like our brother Towne, who are so conscious of God that they seem to float in the very atmosphere of his love, who say,—“These charges against the church are all true; but it is the fault of the creeds and theologies that have been imposed upon it and not of its founder, Jesus. The fault is in the stream and not in the fountain.” Both agree in their admiration of the life and teachings of Jesus. One is for purging the church and retaining it. The other for throwing the corpse overboard. Both agree that the old house is full of rotten timbers, of decaying skeletons and frightful ghosts, and will not do for our brother men to dwell in. One says, let us remove the skeletons, and the ghosts will leave. Let us purify the house from cellar to garret. Let us put new timbers in place of the rotten ones and make it habitable. Let the statues of the saints and the pictures of the martyrs remain. He is a liberal Unitarian. No, says the other. The house is so rotten that it won't pay for repairs. The walls are too deeply stained with blood. It may have afforded some shelter in the past, but it has been a prison and a tomb for mankind. Let us tear it down and build anew. Let us lay the foundations deep and strong upon God's granite. We will use all the good stones that we find in the ruins and new stones from the quarries of to-day. He is a Free Church man. Both are good builders and would make a good house. Humanity stands shivering to enter the portals of this glorious temple. Let us serve as earnest and willing workers with either or both.

The New York Nation, in its excess of information upon every conceivable subject of human thought, is occasionally conspicuously inexact. On the 21st ult. it announced to a surprised New England community that—"At the time the Puritans were burning for witchcraft, and exiling Roger Williams into the wilderness, the Catholic colony of Maryland had taken the most tolerant grounds with respect to liberty of conscience."

The Nation couldn't well have got more serious blunders into fewer lines. "Burning for witchcraft" was never an employment of the Puritans. A few of them, in Eastern Massachusetts, as the Worcester Spy correctly states, gave way for a time to an outburst of fanatical rage against "witches;" but it was soon suppressed by Puritan influence, and never renewed, although in England, then and long afterwards, trying "witches" and ordering them to execution was a constant business of the courts. During the temporary madness at Salem, no "witch" was burned. It is equally a misrepresentation to say that toleration, in the colony of Maryland, was due to the Catholics of that colony. The charter of Maryland was framed by the Protestant government of England, and Maryland was under the control of that government until the revolution of '76 created the United States. To this fact, adds the Spy, is due whatever toleration existed in that colony. The Catholics of Maryland were not free to persecute Protestants. They knew very well that the English government would not allow such persecution. As their own peace and security was due to Protestant toleration, they could not very well interfere with liberty of conscience in others.—Commonwealth.

A Roman Catholic Silesian farmer, discussing war matters with one of his neighbors, said,—“The Prussians have got the best of it in Schleswig-Holstein and in Austria; but they will never conquer the French till God Almighty himself turns Protestant!”

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society will be held for the next three Sunday evenings at 7 o'clock, in "Gitskey's Grand Opera House." The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—Meetings immediately after the meetings of the Independent Society. Subject of discussion for Nov. 20:—"Why are Liberals less willing than Conservatives to make Sacrifices for their Ideas?"

The editor of THE INDEX proposes to devote the entire number this week to the Western Conventions which have been held under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. This being the case, we gladly give up a considerable part of our portion of the paper to the same purpose; and, with regard to the Conventions at Indianapolis and Toledo, shall content ourselves with simply indicating the questions that were discussed and the speakers who took part. Nor is it so important to report these Conventions in detail, since, though each had its peculiar features, they were based on the general plan of the Cincinnati Convention reported last week.

The Convention at Indianapolis opened on Thursday evening, November 3d. The hall, a large one, was very nearly filled with an audience of marked intelligence and earnest interest in the objects of the meeting. Rev. Henry Blanchard, minister of the Unitarian Society of the city, presided at this opening session and made a few introductory remarks of welcome,—cordially commending the earnestness and sincerity of those who were working in the Association, though he might not in all things work with them. Mr. Frothingham, the President of the Association, followed with an address similar to that which he made at the opening of the Cincinnati Convention, delineating the general ideas of the free religious movement. Brief addresses were also made by Messrs. Abbot and Potter in the same line of thought. On Friday morning, the Convention discussed the subject of "The Relation of Religion to the State in America,"—including the question of the Bible in the Public Schools. This topic was introduced by a lucid address from Miss Lillie Peckham, who took strong ground for the utter secularization of the State and of the Schools. Thomas Vickers, Rowland Connor, E. C. Towne, and others, spoke on the same side. Free discussion and a statement from the other side were invited. No one accepted the invitation to defend the use of the Bible as a book of worship in the schools. Rev. Mr. Blanchard, however, though not himself taking that side, stated some of the arguments for it, and wished that they might be considered by the speakers present. Mr. Vickers replied. At the afternoon session Mr. Abbot repeated the essay read at Cincinnati, on the "Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition," and an interesting discussion followed, participated in by Messrs. Frothingham, Towne, and others. Later in the session, Col. J. O. Martin, of Indianapolis, read a paper on "The Work of Radicals in Indiana." This essay was based on statistics as well as faith, and was a spirited plea for organization. The question opened at Cincinnati by Hon. Mr. Reemelin,—“Will the Coming Man attend Church?” proved such a fertile and vital topic, that it was made the subject of the closing session at each of the other Conventions. At Indianapolis it was introduced by an able and trenchant address from E. C. Towne, which we hope may somehow get into print, though he spoke only from brief notes. Mr. Abbot, Miss Peckham, and Messrs. Frothingham, Connor, Potter and Vickers followed, speaking to the different points of the same subject. And at a late hour the Convention adjourned,—the members of the Association and the local friends both feeling that it had been a success. The hospitality of the Indianapolis people was hearty, hale, and generous.

Our speakers, separating in various directions for Sunday, met again in Toledo Monday evening, November 7th. A fine audience greeted them in Gitskey's Opera House. The Hon. Richard Mott was made Chairman for the evening, and opened the meeting with some pertinent and wisely chosen remarks on the advantages of free inquiry and the possibility of free spiritual fellowship. The Secretary of the Association followed with a brief statement of the origin of the organization and its plan of work. The President then made an elaborate address on its fundamental principles and aims, holding the close attention of the people for more than an hour. This address, though having the same object, was quite different in form from that made at the opening session of the other Conventions, and we very much regret that no good report of it is extant. On Tuesday morning, Rabbi Wise read a paper on "Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense," which made an excellent introduction to the discussion on this topic, which occupied the morning hours. The speakers were those who had taken part in the previous meetings, with the re-inforcement of Mr. G. B. Stebbins, of Detroit. Rabbi Wise was also a strong addition to the working force of the platform, and took a most hearty interest in all the proceedings. In the afternoon, Mr. Vickers opened the subject of "The Proper Use of Sunday," with an essay that ought to be printed as a tract and spread all over the country. Rabbi Wise, Rowland Connor, Mr. Cross, of Toledo, and others followed, all advocating the use of Sunday, not as a day of sacred observance, but for the highest ends of culture and of mental and moral improvement. "Will the Coming Man attend Church?" was again asked and answered in the evening. Miss Lillie Peckham introduced the question with an admirable essay. It was spoken to by Jew, Christian and Come-Outer, by the believer in Spiritism, and by those who would not affirm a belief in immortality, and, though there was much difference of opinion in details, there was very substantial agreement in the proposition, that, since the existing man does not now go very much to the existing church, the coming man, if he goes to church at all, must make a very different church, and that it was already time to begin to make it.

Thus ended the series of Conventions. The Toledo friends were outdone by no others in the cordial reception of our meeting and its speakers. The Conventions have fully realized the expectations of those who projected them. This must suffice for remark at present. Next week we shall give a summary of reflections concerning the experiment.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science," a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

THE WESTERN MAN WHO SAW THE OCEAN.—I saw a man at Newport coming out upon the cliff by Easton's beach, where the ocean all at once lifts up, and looks face to face with the gazer, over the rocks. The ocean was pouring in long rolling waves between Ochre Point and Easton's Point, drumming under Forty Steps and breaking with power and whiteness upon the sandy crescent of the beach. The man's face was so pathetic and his look so affected me that I looked myself at the sea again, and felt more than ever the glory of it. He gazed away a little while, and then observing me near his feet, he recovered himself.

"Is that the sea, sir?" he said; "the ocean?"

"Yes."

"It's not a bay, nor a channel; but it's the whole thing—the genuine Atlantic?"

"Yes! There's nothing past that but Europe."

He looked at it again in silence for some time, and then remarked:—

"It looks just like the pictures of it. It's mighty fine. I never saw it before."

"What part of the world are you from?"

"Born in Ohio, sir. Moved to Kansas. Always a Western man. I came East on purpose to look at the sea, and now that I'm here, I guess I'll enjoy an hour of it."

So he sat down on the grassy cliff, and looked, and there I left him, a delighted worshipper. He will, perhaps, go home to tell his boys how it sounds, how it roars, how the boats gallop on it, how the land on its verge wears a naked look as if smitten by its gales. —Correspondent Chicago Tribune.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER WRITTEN BY ELIAS HICKS, TO ———, DATED 2D MO. 16, 1825.—"There is certainly a very great inconsistency in the professed belief of far the greater part of the inhabitants of Christendom, and indeed many in our society, all which has been produced through blind tradition, in which they have been driven to believe that not one sentence in the book called the Bible, however inconsistent with reason and truth, is to be called in question, but to be taken on trust, right or wrong, although, if rightly examined under the guidance of truth and right reason, many incongruities and errors would be discovered. And many very fatal ones, as respects the true interest of mankind, for if it is not so, from whence has risen all the strife, different sentiments and opinions, animosities, quarrels, wars, bloodshed, and a flood of other evils, all of which arise principally from the different views and opinions that men have about what is contained in the history of the Bible, and which disturbances will never come to an end, until the Bible is brought down to its right standard, as all other books, a mere history of past events, and which every man has a right to read, and consider, and judge of, as he does other histories; and when this comes to be the case, the Bible will be more generally read, and become more useful than it has ever yet been."

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE UNITY OF SPIRITUAL FREEDOM, AND THE OPPORTUNITY WHICH AMERICA OFFERS FOR ITS DEVELOPMENT.

[An Essay read by Rev. W. J. Potter at the Cincinnati Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

The Committee of Arrangements for this Convention have desired to present as the subject for consideration and discussion at this session, "The Unity of Spiritual Freedom, and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development." In undertaking to open this subject, I feel that I hold the key-principle of the free religious movement, and I would fain strike the key-note of the day's discussions. At least I am very sure that in this subject lies the fundamental principle of the Free Religious Association, and as an interested member and officer of the Association from its origin, I would so present the subject, if possible, that you who have gathered in this Convention may see clearly that the Association has a solid basis, a deep significance, and an indisputable right to be,—that it has beneath it a sufficient principle, that it had for its origin a sufficient cause, and that it has before it a definite purpose and destiny.

Our main word, our central principle, is Freedom,—freedom of thought, freedom of faith, freedom in respect to religious belief and practice. Without this principle of Freedom, of absolute individual liberty of thought, conscience, and faith, we should not have organized; we should not have called this Convention to-day. And yet, though we believe in this perfect individual freedom, this sacredness of individual thought and action, we believe also in association,—else, too, we should not have organized. We believe in fellowship, in fraternity, in brotherhood; and we believe in fellowship, fraternity, brotherhood, on the basis of perfect individual liberty. We believe that men, though absolutely free in thought and inquiry, absolutely free in matters of conscience and faith, can yet come together in association for common ends, can live and work together for common purposes, can find help and profit in each other's society,—that by a free comparison of their views, the result of their free thought, they can help one another in the discovery of truth, in the promotion of righteousness, and in advancing the solid happiness of each other and of mankind; and further, we believe that it is by association on the basis of perfect individual freedom, that humanity is to come into that state of perfect fellowship, that ideal brotherhood, which has been the dream of wise and good men in all ages,—the brotherhood of race with race, of nation with nation, of individual with individual; wherein aspiration will be added to aspiration, effort to effort, strength to strength, all working together for the common weal. And we believe that America, from its separation from the institutions of the old world, from the civil and social freedom which it offers, from the malleable condition of its society drawn from all parts of the world, presents the best possible opportunity for developing this ideal fellowship into actual existence. And therefore it was that the Free Religious Association was born in America; and it is to-day no New England conceit, no Boston notion, no provincialism of sect, or philosophy, or theology, but an American Association; as capacious in its principles, purpose, and destiny, as America itself, and especially at home out here by the broad rivers and the boundless prairies of the West.

I think it must now be sufficiently clear why I should say that this subject especially includes and covers the fundamental principle and purpose of the Free Religious Association. The subject accurately designates the very movement, names the very ideas, which called the Free Religious Association into being. But, though an interested member of the Association, and most heartily believing in its mission, it is of this movement that I am to speak today. I am here more concerned with ideas, than with any organization that strives to represent them. Spread and establish the ideas, and the organization will take care of itself.

What, then, are we to understand by "Unity of Spiritual Freedom?" I should say, first, that unity in some sense has always been the religious ideal,—unity of man with man and of man with God. The ideal aim of all religions is reconciliation, concord, peace, communion, fellowship,—the bringing of the human and the divine into oneness; the bringing of man out of his conflict with error and passion and sin and disease and sorrow, into a condition of harmony with his own nature, and with the eternal providence of law that asserts its right to rule his nature. Religion has sometimes taken very strange ways for expressing and achieving this ideal,—ways that have led only to further discord; to theological hostility and bitterness; to sectarian bigotry and persecution; to divisions and wars, the most cruel the world has known. Nevertheless, whenever the highest and purest aim of any religion has been expressed, it has been spiritual reconciliation, moral unity, fraternal fellowship of man with man, filial fellowship of man with the Infinite. The Hebrew prophets were fond of painting this picture of perfect peace as the result of the triumph of their faith upon the earth. The vision embodied itself in the expectation of the Messianic Kingdom. Christianity took up the same hope with some dogmatic modification. Confucianism, Buddhism, Brahmanism, have all attempted to find the way to universal harmony.

Yet no religion in its organized form has ever reached this ideal. The process towards it is one of historical development,—of growth, of steps and stages. Let us look at Christianity as the religion with whose history the majority of us here are most familiar, and the religious stock from which most of us have sprung. We may note three distinct stages in its development.

After Christianity had passed its first days of inspiration, then came in the natural order of its historical career the stage of ecclesiasticism. The new faith, the fresh inspiration and hope and life became embodied in an institution called the Church. The Church became the recognized receiver, keeper, preserver and defender of the new religion. To get at the religion, therefore, and enjoy its benefits, one must needs go through the church. Now the church claimed to be catholic and universal; yet it drew a sharp line of distinction between itself and that portion of mankind outside of its limits. It claimed to have found spiritual unity; but its unity was submission of individual will to ecclesiastical domination. It had much to say about the communion and fellowship of saints; but the saints were always supposed to have graduated from the membership of the church. It established "brotherhoods" and "sisterhoods"—some of them inspired with true heroism and grace—hinting at the grand aim of spiritual unity—but the bond was always limited by ecclesiastical ties. The fraternity stopped just where assent to the authority of the church stopped. And for many centuries Christianity remained in this ecclesiastical stage. The Christian religion and the Christian church were one and the same. All ideals of spiritual fellowship, of unity, of fraternity, were limited by ecclesiastical lines and conditioned by ecclesiastical exigencies. The idea of unity was preserved, but it was unity through the principle of submission to some external authority. The theory of the church was that mankind were children,—that they were to receive what was told them for truth without question, and were not to reason in matters of religion, but to obey.

Of course on such a basis universal spiritual unity was impossible. Mankind will not remain children. All the time, and in spite of the theories of the church, they were being civilized and educated out of the condition of childhood into the condition of manhood. Reason asserted its natural rights and would ask questions. Whence did the natural fallible men whom the church had made expounders of truth derive their superior wisdom, that their word was not to be questioned? Whence did the church itself get its right to demand submission to its authority? Whence its power to dictate what human beings shall believe and do in this life, or what their fate shall be in the next? Such are the questions that reason, maturing out of the conditions of childhood into manhood, naturally grew bold to ask. And so came the Protestant movement,—the revolt of reason against the claims of the Roman Catholic Church to be the sole receiver, supporter, and interpreter of the Christian religion.

The seed of Protestantism was the authority of individual reason as opposed to ecclesiastical authority; and as Catholicism represents the stage of ecclesiasticism in the history of Christianity, so it may be said that Protestantism represents the stage of individualism. The ecclesiastical power, it is true, did not cease with the birth of Protestantism. The Catholic Church remained strong and vigorous, and it has just logically completed its historical career by affirming the official infallibility of the Pope as the representative and executor of its dogma of infallible authority. Nor did the elements of ecclesiasticism remain wholly in the Catholic Church. Some of them passed over into Protestantism. Still, the central and most vital impulse of the Protestant Reformation was the right of private judgment in matters of religion; and into that impulse passed henceforward a large part of the vitality and strength and effective power of Christianity. It is true that Protestantism, no less than Catholicism, claimed to have an infallible standard. Instead of making the church infallible, it made the Bible infallible. It went back of the church to the New Testament, and said, "There is an infallible rule of faith and duty." But in letting every man read the New Testament for himself and interpret it, by the aid of his own reason and study, for himself, it is clear that this was a standard of infallibility, that would have no more uniformity than would the individual decisions of human reason itself. And as a matter of fact there is no book in the world (unless, perhaps, it be the sacred books of other religions) that has been so variously interpreted as the Bible has been in Protestant Christendom. What numbers of creeds and sects, not merely differing but antagonistic to each other, have been founded upon it! The history of Protestantism has been marked by disintegration into sects, and of sects into individual men and women. It is, as I have said, the stage of individualism in Christianity. And as the logical ultimate of Catholicism is the doctrine of Papal infallibility, so the logical ultimate of Protestantism is the assertion of the authority of individual reason, unrestrained and unlimited, save by the laws of reason itself.

And it looks now as if the Protestant principle had so nearly actually reached its ultimate that we may begin to see the rudiments of the new stage in religious history that is to succeed. It is true that the Protestant sects will not as yet admit as yet the absolute right of reason. In matters of faith they all set at least some nominal limits to reason. Nevertheless the Protestant principle has triumphed, inasmuch as throughout Protestant Christendom science, literature, politics, and in a great measure questions of philanthropy and social reform are emancipated from the authority of the church and are held amenable solely to natural reason. These great departments of modern civilization, including the most active and vital interests of society are, indeed, almost wholly outside of the church, and would treat with contempt any claim of the church to dominate over them. They have been given over by the principle of Protestantism to the domain of natural human thought and culture, and there is no reclaiming them now under any ecclesiastical authority. The right of private judgment has in Protestant Christendom progressed so far towards absolute conquest that we may already see a new tendency beginning to be developed out of it. We have had the stage of Roman ecclesiasticism; we are in the midst of Protestant individualism; and now we are to have the era of universal unity and fellowship.

Naturally, Protestantism has done very little directly towards the ideal religious aim,—spiritual unity. It has done even less than Catholicism directly for this end. Its unity has been the unity of a creed; its fellowship, the fellowship of a sect. In the place of the united brotherhood of a large and mighty church it has established many petty sectarian fellowships, in which the members keep breaking off from one another until we come to the isolated communion of individual men and women with their own hearts. Yet it was necessary that Protestantism should do just this disintegrating work; necessary that it should attack the principle of ecclesiastical authority with the counter principle of the authority of individual reason; for only by thus breaking down the false basis of ecclesiastical fellowship, which could never become universal, could the ground be prepared for that true fellowship of spirit in which all humanity are to be one. For what is the corner stone of this broad, universal human fellowship, but just that which Protestantism has been hewing out and setting in place,—individual freedom of thought and belief, and therefore human equality,—every man in spiritual rights the peer of his brother? The disintegrating individualism that characterizes Protestantism has been the very process through which it has been working toward the ideal of a grander spiritual unity. Catholicism, as I have said, treated mankind as children. Protestantism was the revolt of maturing manhood against the leading strings of childhood, and brought Christendom to its majority. Now opens in natural sequence the era of unity and co-operative fellowship, wherein man shall meet man as equal brothers, mutually respecting each other's mental and spiritual rights as members of one family, and working together with the best aid that each can bring for the general welfare of the whole household. It is now desecrated at last that spiritual unity cannot rest on identity of belief nor be determined by ecclesiastical bonds; but, in order to be perpetual and universal, must be based on man's natural capacity and desire to know the truth and to do the right. The way to unity is through mental and spiritual freedom.

Now America offers special advantages for the development of this unity. We have here a free State, commanding the room and resources of a whole vast continent, which guarantees by its fundamental law equal opportunity and privilege to all races and all religious beliefs. We invite here, by our offer of freedom, people of every nationality and blood, the adherents of every faith, the believers in every philosophy, the workers in every trade, the pursuers of every kind of knowledge and enterprise. We say to them all, "Here shall you have full and free scope for your individual conviction or taste or energy, whatsoever it be, on the sole condition that you respect the freedom of every other member of the nation and the fundamental moralities of society,—without which condition your own freedom could not be guaranteed." This, I say, is the theory of America, not that its practice fully conforms to its theory. Perfect liberty is not yet an actual fact in America.

Yet the theory has been so far put into actual practice that we have here in this country to-day, enjoying the equal opportunities of its freedom and the equal protection of its laws, and the equal rights of its citizenship, representatives of every nation in Europe, and indeed of the Caucasian blood, and devotees of every sect and form of Christian faith. Nor do we stop here. We have just lifted to citizenship the representatives of a race in no other part of the world as yet assimilated to modern civilization. The African, brought here at first and domiciled here in flagrant violation of our principle of freedom, America is now in obedience to its principle lifting to the position of equal citizenship. This race makes an eighth of the population of the country. And now on our Western coast the door is freely open to the swarming Mongolian population of Asia. And it is idle to say that the Chinese are not to become citizens,—that they are only to be brought here because they will submissively perform the drudgery of physical labor at cheap rates, and will be content to remain in that degraded condition of cheaply paid servitude. All such things will come to nought, and ought to come to nought. America, just escaped with her life and liberty from a civil war, which was the retribution she had to suffer for the crime of enslaving the negro, will not repeat the African experiment with the Mongolian race, even in the milder form of a servile caste of labor. The Chinese will in time become citizens; they will demand and receive the equal opportunities and privileges of the Republic; and will bring into our American civilization and life some vital elements from their own blood and nationality. The Indian race is here already; and a relic of it will probably survive all the outrages it receives from, and all the opposition it makes to, the civilization of the continent, to contribute something to the coming national character and power. The American nationality, then, is not only to be made up from all the nations of civilized Europe, but here are four out of five great race-divisions of mankind (following the old nomenclature) on the American soil already,—the Caucasian leading the van by an immense distance and holding the power in its hands, yet the others, under the American principle of freedom, destined to contribute no unimportant elements to the shaping of the future civilization of the continent. And the fifth race, the Malaysian, is not far away. In the Sandwich Islands, it is close to our Pacific door, and in intimate relations with us, even if it do not before long ask for national union. Individuals of the race are already in our own seaport cities; and in the wake of the Chinese emigration there is no reason to doubt many of this race will follow from the densely populated islands of the Indian and Pacific oceans.

But leaving the distant probabilities of the future aside, looking only at the present and at the immediate future, it is clear that, in the education of mankind, God is working out by this American Republic some of his greatest problems, and on a vaster scale than was ever before attempted in the period of human history. It seems as if he has reserved this continent for a new form of civilization,—which, while deriving its central force from the Indo-European, or Christian civilization, should yet receive contributions from other branches of the human family, and ultimately absorb into itself whatever is vital in the intelligence and strength and creeds and codes of all races and nations; and so should solve the question of the unity of the race and the brotherhood of man by proving the actual ability of all races and nations to live together in perfect freedom under one form of government, and within the amicable bonds of one social system.

Now an important element toward the successful solution of this problem, as well as one of the mightiest results of this bringing together on the soil of one free nation such a variety of nationality and race and faith and temperament, must be a modification of the popular religious belief of the country. It is impossible that people of such different convictions and such various modes of thought and living, and coming from such a variety of stock, should mingle freely together without acting and reacting upon each other, and mutually shaping each other's opinions into new moulds of thought and expression. Even if we believe that the whole mass will eventually be "Christianized,"—will, in a technical sense, be converted to Christianity, yet Christianity itself will be modified in accomplishing the conversion. History shows that no religion imported from abroad ever changed the character of a race more than the race changed the character of the religion. The Arabians have always been as to national characteristics essentially the same people, whether Pagan, or Jewish, or Christian, or Mohammedan, in religious faith. Imperial Rome made the religion of Jesus an imperial religion, magnificent with royal splendor and ceremony. And, again, the free-thinking, individual, independent German stock made Christianity the bulwark of civil and religious liberty, and was careful to put its infallible standard of faith and practice in the keeping of each man's private judgment. Rome and Germany both, in turn, modified the history of Christianity quite as much as their history was modified by it. The Africans in this community have accepted the Christianity of their masters; yet it is clear that they flavor it with something of the barbarous faith that was held by their ancestors in their native land, and that still inheres as a native instinct in their blood. So that, even if the whole country, with all its varieties of population, is to be "Christianized," it would not follow at all that its religion would be of the phase which any sect now designates as Christianity. But the probabilities are that there are vast portions of this mixed population that are not in any technical sense to be "Christianized." The Jews already count their hundreds of thousands in the population of the United States, and they are increasing equally with Christians in numbers and in social and financial position. At least a third of the population counted as belonging to Christendom have no connection with organized Christianity, and no positive belief in Christianity as a specific Revelation. Many of this class, indeed, have very positive convictions against the specific claims of Christianity, and are no more likely to be converted to Christianity than they are to convert Christians to their views of the sufficiency of natural religion. And now the Chinese are here with their ancient and tenacious faith, for which they claim a special revelation many centuries anterior to the advent of Christianity. Now, not to speak of the important phases of belief which may, however, have their influence, here are three great and venerable religions, each of which has shown a mighty vigor and power in the world's history, and each of which still counts in the world its millions of adherents, brought face to face, and side by side, in this free country, each with full freedom, if America is true to her principles, to develop its faith, and propagate its worship to the best of its ability. Is nothing new to come from this new combination of conditions? If any think that Christianity, from its advantage of prior occupation, or greater prestige, or overwhelming numbers, or superior resources of any kind, is going to turn these other faiths as mere provincialisms into its own channels, they so think, as it seems to me, against both reason and history. That is not the way to unity. Were Christianity the enthusiasm of faith which it was in its origin, it might possibly have this power. But the time for that kind of power is past. Christianity now comes appealing to reason for the justification of its claim as a religion of supernatural authority, and must take its chances for making that claim good in the court of reason, where evidence is now very closely sifted by science and common sense.

Moreover, Christianity itself has been modified not a little already in America by the influence of democratic ideas and of practical freedom in moulding individual belief. Democracy means not only civil equality, but spiritual equality. It instinctively abhors priesthoods and papacies and ecclesiastical hierarchies, and, if they traditionally exist, contrives quickly to divest them of all but a nominal authority. It favors the practice of every man's keeping his own conscience and forming his own opinions; invests man with self-sovereignty as God's freeman; and is hostile to every form of lordship or kingship less than that of God himself. Democracy, therefore, educates people to question every kind of spiritual authority that is set up for man outside of the divine voice that speaks in his own breast. And to such an extent has this education proceeded in America that it is well-nigh futile to present any argument in behalf of Christianity on the old ground of a miraculously attested revelation. The old ground was, Jesus spoke the truth, and what he spoke is to be taken as truth, because he was the Messiah, his office being vouched for by the wonders he performed. And this was in entire keeping with monarchical ideas. The new ground which Christian theologians take is, that Jesus was Messiah and Spiritual King because he spoke the truth, and that his authority and historical power rest upon his mighty utterance of spiritual truth. This is the democratic modification of the Messianic office. And logically, it is evident, it takes from underneath Christianity all claim to be in any respect different from other religions except so far as it may have more of truth. The other religions become, so far as they contain truth, just as authoritative as it. And when John Chinaman comes with the Golden Rule from the lips of Confucius, he may claim that his master was inspired to utter it no less than was Jesus five hundred years later.

And this democratic modification of the old claims made for Christianity points out for us the path to religious unity. Christendom is beginning to see that truth is the grand test of religious authority and power,—the only solid and permanent test of the genuineness of religious inspiration and the validity of religious institutions; and that man has no other test of truth than is furnished in his own intuitive and reasoning intelligence. On this ground, the grand aim and achievement of all religion is to discover truth, and to get it recognized and adopted and lived. To come to religious unity, therefore, to develop religious unity and fellowship out of the various conflicting sects and creeds that are brought into free contact on this continent, we must go down below all that estranges and divides them, all their specific claims and peculiar dogmas and forms, to the fundamental principles of faith itself; to the very elements of reverence and moral obligation and practical righteousness. When we get below the religions to religion—below creeds and modes of worship to the impulse that bends the soul in awe before the infinite mystery—below ecclesiasticisms to the faith that is striving through them to express itself in the institutions and activities of social life—below sacraments and prayers to the struggling aspiration and self-consecrating will that are striving against the ills and temptations of actual experience after some ideal holiness,—then we have come to common ground; then we have put ourselves in the place where we can hear one consenting voice from all the jarring tongues of men, one harmonious revelation from all souls. Then we have come to ground where all the children of men can stand together, side by side, foot to foot, shoulder to shoulder, each to help every other by whatsoever clearer light his larger intelligence or keener vision or quicker conscience may reveal, and each to get from every other whatsoever of truth or strength he may lack and they may have.

To find this ground for the various sects and religions is, I believe, the destined mission of America in the spiritual education of mankind.

WILL THE COMING MAN ATTEND CHURCH?

[An Essay by Hon. Charles Reemelin, read at the Cincinnati Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

Premising that in the words—"Coming Man"—the "Coming Woman" was included, Mr. Reemelin said:—

When I accepted the invitation of the committee of arrangement for this body, it was done with the mutual understanding, that in the treatment of my subject they must be free from me, and I was to be free from the Free Religious movement, for whose promotion this Convention has been especially convened; in other words, they have invited a heretic into a heretic assembly, and I, presume, both are willing to assume the consequences.

It occurred to me, however, afterward, as I reflected on my topic, that it imposed on me an entirely new character, that of a prognosticator, for the part assigned to me in the programme is to foretell whether the coming man will attend church. As I have been often rather free in criticising others, the reflection is not specially encouraging, that I am now to prophesy, and thereby subject myself to the severest test to which a man can expose himself, that of pretending to predict future events; but having accepted the position, there is nothing left me but to try and meet this issue as best I may.

He who wishes to understand the present must surely study well the past, and thus armed, he may venture to predict the future, for all phenomena are but possible sequences of actual antecedents. Our subject is—The probable future of the Church; and we cannot avoid, if we would, an examination of its past and present, for in these lie the keys to our unlocking the coming time as well as the coming man. This duty we shall perform as briefly as possible, and now ask your careful attention to our premises.

Professing Hering, of Vienna, resting on facts eliminated by Darwin, as to the presence of minute ancestral germs in living individuals, has taken the ground that all present actions of individualized organic beings are but the last culminating links of an endless chain of memories, part of which are conscious and part unconscious. This explains to us how peculiar family characteristics arise in certain individuals, also how ancestral types reappear in progenies; and we can readily deduce therefrom, that when men are concentrated into associations and public bodies, we obtain the aggregates of the good or ill that may lie in the individuals composing them. Moreover, it leads us to infer, that as in individuals we find the past as recollections, that are either conscious or unconscious, so is each congregated body of men the confluence of anterior memories represented in the organization. But it does not unfold to us why public bodies, as for instance churches, founded as they usually are by some eminent individuals, whose motives are pure and high, grow almost invariably into infatuations, zealotries, and dogmatisms.

The social scientist, Michaelis, now the right hand of Bismarck, on questions of social science has done us the service to point out the cause of the latter peculiar phenomena in human conduct. It is, that when men co-operate for a given object, they multiply their idealities with their interests, and then intensify the product by stimulating each other, so that finally it culminates in a sort of mental disease. In this way, there is produced in armies either great foolhardiness, or, during reverses, great demoralization, in stock jobbing, over-speculation or panic, and in church matters, higher religiosity or superstition.

But as we try to master this conception, there arises involuntarily the disheartening inquiry: Is mankind then forever to go the round of folly, which is generated in these centres of human thoughts and purposes? And Michaelis again comes to our relief, and informs us, that these diseases of the human mind, which are the result of associate interaction, have diminished both in extent and intensity as men have risen in intelligence. He teaches us further, that experience leads these men now to self-criticism their conduct prompter and better than formerly, and that it teaches them to make a correcter diagnosis of the disease, when it appears among them. He points out also certain vigilances which have sprung up and which confine the generation of those diseases within narrower and narrower limits.

Using these observations of the men of science as keys, we feel encouraged that we may unlock the past, present, and future of the Church. We think we see, as with a rapid sweep of our mind's eye we survey the history of the Church, how the sublimely kind Jesus was stimulated by his surroundings into the exalted idea of his mission; how his apostles and disciples, though hardly understanding him, magnified it into the idealities which we now find in the Bible; how St. Paul expanded these and added pharisaic pertinacities; how these were followed by interweavings of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophies; how St. Augustine, Scotus Erigena, Anselmus, of Canterbury, Thomas Aquinas, worked these conceptions into the Christianity of the middle ages; how all finally culminated into a hierarchy under Gregory VII.; how with Copernicus, Galileo and Kepler came the turning point, and how thenceforth, as intelligence increased and widened, the hyper-religiosities and superstitions diminished in extent and intensity; how Giordano Bruno, altogether the wisest and truest reformer of his age, and Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and Knox, with their followers, became so many activities for relaxing the anterior centralization, but unfortunately also new centres of special asceticism; how in our times, the church, or rather churches, are the embodiments of a mass of paradoxes, which perplex the age, and which are absolutely insoluble, without taking into account the Darwinian law, as applied by Professor Hering, and further eliminated for us by Michaelis.

Guided by their light, it becomes apparent that Christianity has ever been a culminative aggregation of antecedent religiosities; that in its general development the maintenance and higher culture of a sound moral tone in society was one of its cherished objects; that there have, however, also been mingled with it, intolerances, hyper-religiosities, superstitions and infatuations, that were produced, using Michaelis' words, "by the multiplication of idealities with certain interests." It would also seem that the present condition of the churches may be easily understood, if we will but see in it the manifold struggles society is making to slough off the excrescences which zealots have interposed, and which obscured and made secondary the primary object of all religions and churches, viz: the cultivation and elevation of the moralities of the human race. We then comprehend how the necessity to have and enforce ethics makes men congregate into civil and religious government; but we understand, also, how the growing intelligence of modern times is wearing upon the false religious outgrowths which intensified zeal has engendered in religion, and is likely to generate therein hereafter. The Future will not be all sunshine!

Recognizing this as the status of our churches, we understand why their audiences are growing more and more dissimilar from the crowds who worshipped in ancient temples, how our preachers are losing the priestly caste, how our church service is drifting away from certain adorations and ceremonials which rest on the idea of an arbitrary God; in short, how, within our congregations, ancestral germs are in conflict with the embryos generated by exacter knowledge. The "geological fables and mythological dreams" (using Humboldt's words), as well as the church services built upon them, with all their excrescences, are losing their hold more and more, and we are rising to conditions in which the idolatries of past ignorance will be dead; yet religion and morality will be alive!

The true process, then, of bettering Christianity, is not to go back to ancient semi-comprehensions and then intensify them again! Not an intensified Christian Jew is the coming man, but a more and more enlightened human being, open to all the knowledge eliminated by modern thinkers; one that is, as such, better and better guarded against the new intensifications that will surely be attempted.

Raise, dear friends, your eyes away from your own church or sect, and look at Christianity as an entirety. Take the Church of Rome and its latest Ecumenical Council, then the Episcopalians, Lutherans, Calvinists, Methodists, Baptists, Campbellites, and forget not the Mormons and the Shakers, and answer me, what is right about them all? And what is wrong about them all? Are they not all right in their cultivation of morality? Are they not all wrong in the culture of their mystifications? Every church, yea, every religion known to man, has been perverted by the process we have just pointed out, and this being true, it is obvious that a church cannot be reformed by returning to any of their former mysteries or wonders, or mythological dreams or geological fables; it must be reinvigorated by brightening and burnishing its ethical conceptions by the light of knowledge. Examine the history of Buddhism, of Zoroasterism, Confucism, Taoism, Hebrewism, Mahometanism, and you will find that each and all began by presenting very fair ethics; but that in the course of time there was also added to them false asceticism and mysticisms, until the very authors of the respective religions would not, if they were to reappear to-day, know their children as their own.

It is indeed true that in Christianity ethics and good sense have been less lost sight of than in other churches, and this is its highest glory; but this is due to the fact that it has had to effect its growth, so far as our special Christianity is concerned, through the comparatively higher intelligences of Europeans. As the antique Greeks and Romans had worked into higher mythologies the ante-historic religions that had come to them from Asia, and as the Scythians, Germans, Gauls, and Britons had constructed more natural mysticism out of the Indo-Germanic hyper-religiosities and blind fatuities which their ancestors had worshipped in their old Asiatic homes, so have the inhabitants of the Christian era in Europe modified and improved Christianity. They have acted as a sieve, and they are acting as such to-day, and to this naturally inherent quality of the European mind we owe all those revivifications of the true, and all the abrogations of the false, in our churches. American Christianity is as yet but an outflow of European Christianity, though I do not wish to deny that there are indications of a peculiar American development. Would I could add that it lets us hope that it will be freer from errors than its European sisters! As yet it adheres closer to errors than its trans-Atlantic contemporaries.

So far, we shall, in the main, I think, agree; but I am not so clear that we shall accord as to the best mode of procedure, so as to accelerate the day when mankind shall have no religious service except the cultivation of ethics, under the guidance of men of sound social and ethical education. I apprehend that there lingers among you the belief that human society needs an entire reconstruction through a new free religious organization. I know how perplexed you stand before seeming irreconcilabilities. You see our society, Christian as it is called, a standing contradiction of its nominal religion. You see cruelty instead of mercy, injustice instead of justice, superstition instead of enlightenment, ceremonials instead of religiosity, and you cannot reconcile your ideal Christian people with the real social life that confronts you. In spite of your predilections, the fact stares you in the face that any man who would strictly follow the precepts of Christianity would be a nuisance in our society, and a fit subject for a lunatic asylum.

What an incongruity with social life would be men who would "take no thought of to-morrow," what would we think of men who, if "their coats were taken from them," would give "their cloaks also," or who, when "smitten on one cheek," would "turn the other?" These and other impracticable precepts stand unrepealed, yea, unrepeatable, for they are said to be Divinely ordained. They require a life-long giving up of self, and abnegation of all its interests; a life for others! This is the ostensible theory, the rule, and its grand model is Christ and his apostles, and its typification the Church. But who follows these ideal maxims? No Christian at least! Shall we therefore call all Christians hypocrites, or shall we take the true ground that these rules are contrary to human nature and erroneous? The facts and the theory flatly contradict each other. Why jump at the conclusion that society is fundamentally wrong, and needs radical reconstruction?

In my opinion, the contrary is true. Society has always been as near right as it could be under the circumstances. It is an old proverb that "soup is never eaten as hot as it is cooked," and, for the same reason, men have, as social beings, persistently declined to carry into practice the high-strung, impossible moral austerities which zealous religionists fixed up for them in their church rules. Society rejected Christianity for over three centuries until it modified itself to suit the socialities then in vogue. So it rejected all Protestantism that was incompatible with the then prevailing social status, and society is right to-day in refusing to be reconstructed according to any new creeds manufactured by any single brain, or convocation of brains. It knows that, covered over as the ethics of Christianity may be, with the excrescences of the Church, they are still much better—being the experience of ages—than any that would now be fabricated for society. It has, on the whole, done well in allowing the Church to preach its impossibilities, while it practised its own possibilities. It is doing that now, and Christianity is yielding to it as it has ever yielded to social rule. What church tenet is now carried out literally and strictly? Not one!

Our age is busily engaged in establishing rights, and especially that first of all rights, the right to pursue one's happiness; in other words, to cultivate self-interest. But would it do that safely, if it had not to do it under a contest with a Christianity that represents, say what you will, the duties of man? Does not this opposition secure to us, that, amidst the strife for rights, the sense of duties to others is not forgotten?

Society sees that the churches are a part of itself; that in them are contained, if covered with dust, the ethics of the people and their culture; that it is cleaning them of much that is incongruous by employing advancing science, and in this process it goes on, until it has entirely modified them. These are the activities of our age, and if you will now follow me for a few moments longer, I think I can point some of them out to you as they live and breathe among us.

And first and foremost among these is—The Press. Walter Scott has recorded for us, in Quentin Durward, a peculiar prediction made by Galeotti Martivalle, the astronomer of Louis XI. of France, who said:—

"When I consider the consequences of this invention (printing), I read with as certain anxiety as by any combination of the bodily bodies of the most awful and portentous changes. When I reflect with what slow and limited supplies the stream of science had hitherto descended to us; how difficult to obtain by those most ardent in its search; how certain to be neglected by all, who regard their ease; how liable to be diverted or altogether dried up by the invasions of barbarism—can I look forward without wonder and astonishment to the lot of a succeeding generation, on whom knowledge will descend like the first and second rain, uninterrupted, unabated, and unbounded, fertilizing some grounds and overflowing others; changing the whole form of social life; establishing and overthrowing religions; erecting and destroying kingdoms."

Hold, Galeotti, said Louis; "shall these changes come in our time?"

"No," replied Martivalle; "this invention may be likened to a young tree, which is now newly planted, but shall, in succeeding generations, bear fruit as fatal, yet as precious, as that of the Garden of Eden; the knowledge, namely, of Good and Evil."

And now let us come down to our own time, and follow up the prophetic remarks of the old astronomer by an editorial extract from Henry Ward Beecher's paper, The Christian Union, in the number of October 22, 1870. It shows both the effect of the press on church development, and also how Mr. Beecher is wiser and more far-seeing than any of his colleagues, in wishing to meet half-way the coming man. The editorial is as follows:—

"WANTED, CHRISTIAN LAYMEN.—It is often taken as a matter of course, among our American good people, that a young man of education and ability can save the Lord more effectually in the ministry than anywhere else. It seems to us that this is very far from a matter of course. In practically heathen countries the preaching of the Gospel is the one great necessity. But communities in which the Gospel has been faithfully preached from time immemorial, until Christian truth, at least in its elements, has permeated the whole people,—such communities may have more imperative wants than even the preaching of the Word. We do not wish to disparage the usefulness of the ministerial calling, but we earnestly desire to show how greatly the Church needs the services of the best of her sons in other directions as well as this. There are, in this country, moral forces of immense power which have been far too much left to the handling of merely worldly men."

"See what influence is exerted by the newspaper press. It is more powerful than the pulpit. For perhaps two half-hours on Sunday a man listens, or thinks he listens, to his minister's sermons. But every morning he catches eagerly at his newspaper, and can hardly eat his breakfast until he has read it. Great multitudes never enter a church; but the man who never reads a paper is unknown to civilized regions. Secular newspapers do not indeed deal much with abstract religious belief, but they touch the practical conduct of life everywhere. They form men's political opinions. They administer the justice of public sentiment. They can carry impurity into all homes. When ministers lay down great principles, they make sharp practical applications. Their advantage over the preacher is that they have the public's ear for six days on every topic, while he is fortunate if he gets in on the seventh for his own theme. What a chance for Christian usefulness is here! And how little the field has been occupied! Measure our secular papers by the Christian standard, and see how many of them conform to it even approximately."

Henry Ward Beecher exhibits in this extract a most marvellous discernment; and you, my friends, might be well pondering on it, to find therein the answer—whether the coming man will attend church.

But the Sage of Brooklyn sees, and, we think, too intently, the "Daily Press," and he overlooked, therefore, another very kindred fact, to wit: that every Christian Church is now itself employing the press as one of its means in maintaining its respective organizations; even the Pope has his organ (the Civiltà Cattolica).

Consider now the vast difference between an audience in a church, acted upon by a communal prayer, by music and joint singing or recitation, by an eloquent divine in a clerical dress, by the surroundings of religious art in a peculiar architecture, painting, sculpture, and other symbols, and then intensifying each other, and compare with it the single reader of a religious journal sitting by himself, or surrounded by his family, and reading, with religious editorials, more or less secular information! How much freer from false intensifications, hyper-religions and blind fatuities is the latter, than the man at a church or a camp-meeting! Are not these journals emptying the churches by making the pulpit and divine service more and more an obsolete institution? Is not the church herself modifying—to suit new social requirements—one of the most fruitful instrumentalities, with which it used to intensify mankind in its idealities? The church-goer is now also the reader of a paper; he receives more general intelligence, and is therefore less subject to the stimulations which make him a blind zealot. To realize fully the difference between a Christian people instructed by journals, and one acted upon as stated in assembled congregations, you need only think of the difference that would be manifested in stock dealings, if the auction were dispensed with, or the change that would take place in war, if the drum and the fife and the battle array in large bodies of troops were no part of the military art.

Fix now your attention to another development in our churches, viz: the gradual change in the oratorical labors of the clergy. A few centuries ago there was no such a thing as a sermon; the church service was entirely ceremonial, and that in Latin; and even at the beginning of this century all sermons even in Protestant countries were but yet diluted talk upon the mystic part of our religion. Compare with these the carefully prepared compositions of preachers like the Rev. Mr. Mayo or Dr. Thompson, and how clearly they indicate the current of the tide! Mankind are evidently changing in two directions; first, they are getting shy of subjecting themselves to the grosser intensifications of excited and exciting revival preachers; and second, they are hunting the orators whose sermons contain the largest amount of exact knowledge; and of course the clergy, either from their own better sense, as Beecher does, or from motives of interest, brought about by empty benches and poor incomes, follow the demand of the public mind.

Intimately connected herewith are the lectures, which form now so important an element in our churches; they are another step forward towards the coming man; for lay subjects bring the laity!

The most significant sign of the times is, however, in my opinion, the institution of gratuitous public lectures by the public authorities of many States in Germany, on Sabbath evenings. These lectures are delivered by Professors of Universities, and men of science. We have an approach to such public assemblies in this country in some churches, and among the Turners and free-thinkers, and some churches have even ventured to have secular information imparted on Sunday evenings in the basements of their churches; but what are they compared with those vast assemblages that meet on Sabbath evenings in the public halls of Stuttgart, Munich, Dresden, Leipzig, &c., to listen eagerly to scientific discourses from free-thinking Philosophers and Professors, who take no texts from the Bible! Our lectures are timid yieldings to the demands of society! Theirs are bold advances of knowledge!

Do you not see that a good part of mankind are out of church already; that more are going out, and that very few are going in? The new institutions, of which I have just now spoken, I have witnessed myself; for they are not only popular, but they are becoming a public necessity! Kings and Queens, Cabinet Ministers and Generals, doctors and lawyers, mechanics and laborers, yea, what is most significant, the best women in the land, attend them, and every winter they are getting more crowded and more numerous. Soon they will constitute a chief agency in the elevation and maintenance of the higher moral tone of society, and once being that, what becomes of churches? What of all the aggregates that nurse things irreconcilable with social science?

Is it, then, I put the question fearlessly, so very strained a progress, to think it possible, that even in America the public authorities will in time engage and pay men of classic and scientific education to teach the adult population of the land knowledge? Under Constantine's wise guidance, Greek and Roman Priests turned Christian Bishops and Deacons! In Rome itself, and other places in Europe, the Christian clergy now officiate in pagan temples! Why think it then so preposterous that, in time, our preachers will become changed, and quit sermonizing on what they do not know, and turn to teaching that which they do or shall know?

Do not misunderstand me for this remark. Believe me, that I am fully aware, that teaching science or mechanics or agriculture or any such knowledge is not the sphere of the church; what I mean, is quite another knowledge,—that of knowing how to live as a social being. That is the useful part of all clerical labors; the remainder is the ornamental,—the sensational,—yea, I may as well speak it right out,—the useless part. I recognize fully the propriety, yea, the necessity of having, as a part of social life, a body of men who are educated to teach ethics, but I reject, as worse than fruitless, the maintenance of mere sermonizers on religious dogma.

Not the abrupt abrogation of the old is wanted in churches, so as to conform to the spirit of the age, but the modification thereof. And if you want to learn the way to this modification, go to Zschokke and to Fritz Oberlin, and follow, and improve upon, their example.

Human society is always a coherent entirety with parts that necessarily hold relations and adaptations to each other. No one part can be ruthlessly torn out, nor must there be vacuums; on the contrary, the true Reformer is always he who is content to assist the coming development. But the subject is widening, when the time allotted to me, warns me to limit and confine it, and to hasten to the close.

I say then unhesitatingly: The coming man will not attend Church! Men are undergoing great social changes, and the church will keep changing with them, until in our sense there will be no church. The necessity to have a body of men who are specially educated and devoted to ethics, will always exist, and there ever will be differences among men as to the best method of satisfying this necessity. We cannot expect that the future will be entirely without those victims to their own ignorance or to their disposition "to regard their ease and neglect knowledge," as Martville has it; men whose credulities are abused, as for instance in the crusades, to work them into their fatuities and blind zeal. There will always be many men whose minds are inert, who are averse to the exertion necessary to think well; and such may fall into the hands of men who "multiply idealities with their private interests." What the active thinking men must do is to spread knowledge, so as to diminish the influence of the men who live from the ignorance and stupefactions of mankind. That can be done, and is being done by the spread of better information. Away, then, with all ideal mankind! Give us the realities of life! Of these, the most precious to us is the fact that society is moving, and moving in the right direction!—Commoner.

RELIGION IN THE LIGHT OF REASON AND COMMON SENSE.

[An Essay by Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, read at the Toledo Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

"Reason and Religion" is the theme I am called upon to discuss. I thank the honored Secretary of the Free Religious Association, that he did not write, as many people do think, Reason or Religion. With most of the modern religionists this "or" is a fixed fact. They usually imagine the dominion of one necessitates the subjection of the other. Starting from these premises, in addition to the hypothesis that the multitude reasons feebly and feels keenly, they naturally declare Religion in the form of implicit and uninquiring faith as the only and safest ethical guide of man, and expect not only of those who reason not, but also of those who do reason, to disregard all the objections which the understanding may raise against this or that form of faith. Contrary to the doctrine of the very Bible which they teach, they cannot see that the "Fear of the Lord," as Religion is called in the Hebrew, is "the beginning of wisdom," and not wisdom itself; therefore they demand the suspension of understanding and the sovereignty of faith in the ethical domain of humanity.

Where reason ends, individual authority and mental freedom cease, and man must submit to outer, usually called higher, authority. Therefore one class of religionists must have an infallible head of the church; another must point to an infallible book, creed, or association; and again another must place implicit confidence in a number of men assembled in a conference or synod, to establish their regula fidei. The difference on this point among the various sects amounts to nothing. The infallible man, book, creed, church, conference or synod subjects reason and freedom to the oracles of a few persons, who hold the multitude in mental and moral bondage.

If one would advance the novel theory, that one must only see and not also hear, or vice versa, in order to comply with the will of his Maker, religionists of all classes would instantly assail him with the fair argument,—To what purpose am I given these eyes and these ears, if not to do both seeing and hearing? Man is gifted with no organ, no instinct, no capacity to be kept dormant and useless. The elevation of human nature depends upon the full and symmetrical development of all his organs, instincts, and capacities. We propose the same argument. If man is naturally gifted with understanding, why and wherefore should he not use it to the very best of his abilities? Is it not his sacred duty, for his own benefit and the blessing of society, to make the best use of the choicest gift heaven has bestowed on the mortal creature? Was the physical eye given to the purpose of seeing and the mental eye to blindness? If reason we should and reason we must, why not on the most sublime and most important questions of right and wrong, of good and evil in the light of the eternal Deity; of our relations and duties to God and man; of our salvation and happiness in time and eternity—when these and similar questions prove most attractive to human nature, and offer the most irresistible impulses to the understanding, to exercise, develop, and elevate itself? Declare the freedom of the understanding; in the name of God and humanity let man reason for himself! Remove the obstacles, break the fetters, overthrow the iron walls of uninquiring faith, infallible men or books! Let man be free, and he will reason right, feel right, and do right.

We cannot do it, many religionists say, because we have numerous dogmas and doctrines which will not stand the rigid application of reason. And because we have such dogmas, doctrines, and alleged facts, known to us as mysteries, therefore we must rely upon faith and subject our reason to it. What is to become of the doctrines of trinity, incarnation, atonement, resurrection, mediation, redemption, baptism and absolution of sin, if reason is to govern faith? This is no argument in favor of those doctrines; it is all against them. Because they cannot stand the rigid application of reason, therefore they are not necessary to human happiness, or else the benign Creator of human reason must be accused of the Satanic malignity of having cursed man with the understanding which makes him miserable and wretched in time and eternity. Because they cannot stand the rigid application of reason, therefore they cannot be true, or else understanding is not the power to distinguish truth from error, which, under all circumstances and in all cases aside of matters of faith, it is universally admitted to be. Again, because they cannot stand the rigid application of reason, they are nugatory to the best and holiest interests of humanity, and ought to be dropped out of every good man's religious creed; not merely because they are useless and not true, but chiefly because they obscure the intellect with fictitious mysteries, benighten the reason, clog the judgment, and hinder the free exercise of the understanding, by which man becomes free, intelligent, and happy. We do not argue on the doctrines named exclusively, but on all, of all creeds and systems, which cannot stand the rigid application of reason. They have reduced millions to mental bondage and impressed them with the nugatory belief that they must not reason. Therefore we meet with so much stupidity, ignorance, and thoughtlessness in the world. Therefore we meet with so many hoary children of unripe intellects, who must be taken by their hands by some priest, politician, church or party chief, in order to find their way from the cradle to the grave, always dependent upon somebody else, never depending upon themselves. Therefore, we furthermore maintain, since ignorance and mental bondage are the parents of vice, crime, and folly, there is so much depravity in all classes of societies; the millions are the tools of their cunning leaders, and follow unconsciously almost to the battle-field, to murder and slaughter their own brothers. Therefore—but no, we will draw no more consequences. These will suffice to support our argument in favor of reason and against any faith which cannot stand the rigid application of reason. Anyhow, our argument will sound much more reasonable than that produced in favor of the supremacy of faith.

Your supremacy of reason leads to atheism and nihilism, so the next argument runs; and having uttered it, our neighbors suppose they have defeated and routed us completely. It reminds one of the poor sage whose life was in danger because he was so very ill-shaped, and he lived in a country where ugly persons were not tolerated. Placed before his judge, he was asked why he was so ugly and ill-shaped. "I know not," was the reply; "go and ask my Maker why he made me so and not otherwise." Go and ask the Maker of human intellect why the understanding leads to atheism and nihilism, if it does lead thereto. If such was the fact, why labor any longer under self-delusion? If there is no salvation, no happiness in truth, there can be none in falsehood and fiction. If the understanding leads to atheism and nihilism, then the human family must ultimately arrive there, as nothing can control the power of conviction. If it must be, may it be so at once. If it must be, then face the music, the sooner the better.

But this is a priestly scarecrow, and nothing else. Cunning egotists caution the masses not to reason, not to reflect, in order to have no judgment of their own and depend entirely on their superiors. If you reason, you will be damned, your children will be thieves, your grandchildren murderers, your great-grandchildren barbarians, painted savages, and in the fifth generation the devil will be the sovereign of the universe, they say, and in many instances succeed in rendering important services to stupidity and ignorance. As far, however, as history records, that theory proves to be false. As yet no nation, no tribe capable of intelligent speech, was found without the three gifts of conscience, religion, and the hope of immortality. The same was the case in the time of Cicero, as he himself tells us; and at the very dawn of history, the gigantic figures of those men appear who gave us the written records and the mythological traditions of pre-historic religion, so that we know how man and religion appear inseparable; we know that, like understanding, conscience, religion, and the hope of immortality are the characteristics of human nature. Hence mankind, by its very nature, is not atheistical, nor given to nihilism. So history teaches.

Philosophers, however, some, several or many philosophers, they maintain, led by their understanding, run into atheism and nihilism. If we reason, we shall experience the same fate. We know of many very religious philosophers and many atheistical church members, nay, atheistical priests, which fact neutralizes the above argument. We know still more, viz: that most of the atheistical philosophers argue against the peculiar theistical evidence produced by others, or against the definitions of Deity established in theology, and not against the existence of Deity itself. If one reads the various books called Evidences of Christianity, it is very easy to fall into atheism. If one takes up a book on dogmatic theology, and reads the impertinent assumptions of theologians to define the infinite and attribute human virtues and vices to the absolute, he might become an atheist. But that is theology and dogmatism, the very thing which must go to the museums and antiquarians. Open the book of reason, of clear and free understanding, read in the volume of nature, examine the pages of eternal wisdom in the beauty, perfection, regularity, and harmony of the universe, and there is God in every line, in every letter. Dive into the depth of human conscience and consciousness, of man's own self and his inward mysteries, cast an honest glance into the broad mirror of history, and there is God, immortality, eternal justice, beheld with reason's eye, felt by the innermost fibres of the mind. No danger—the more enlightenment, the more science; the more philosophy, the more truth. We have nothing to fear for our God; dogmatists have, because theirs is the artificial Deity composed of definitions. Our God is the Eternal, Infinite, and Absolute, the Cause of all causes, the Source of life and being. He cannot be demonstrated away, for he is understanding and power himself.

So religion and reason are to go hand in hand. Reason must govern; religion must lead. Religion suggests, reason corrects. Religion is a divine impulse, careless of consequences, and unconscious of its sacred yearning; reason watches over it, to guard it against mischief, such as superstition, prejudice, fanaticism, asceticism, revivals, and camp-meetings. Reason is the Messiah, the Redeemer, and Savior; and religion the invisible bonds to tie man to heaven's dome, and to unite the human family in justice, love, and happiness. The heaven-born twin-sisters must never be separated. Religion must advise and console, and Reason must govern. Therefore give us knowledge, science, philosophy; give us the products of reason, and send your theology to the museum. Give us God and no definitions; truth and no mysteries; facts and no delusions. Give us truth, and we will have the best religion,—that governed by reason.

A good deal of the consolation offered in the world is about as solacing as the assurance of the man to his wife when she fell into the river,—“You'll find ground at the bottom, my dear.”

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

INDIANAPOLIS CONVENTION

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

THURSDAY EVENING SESSION, NOV 3.

A large audience of thinking people assembled at Masonic Hall last evening to hear the address of Mr. Frothingham and others on the subject of Free Religion. In the audience we noticed the leading free-thinkers of the city, a few clergymen of the Evangelical schools, and no less than four Catholic Priests. Mr. Blanchard acted as temporary Chairman, and made the introductory address. He spoke of the good work of the Association.

Mr. Blanchard introduced Rev. O. B. Frothingham, of New York.

[The substance of Mr. Frothingham's address was given last week in our report of the Cincinnati Convention.—ED.]

Mr. Frothingham continued in this strain at considerable length, but the above is sufficient to show the object of the Association as explained by him.

The audience listened with an air of the greatest interest, and once or twice cheered most heartily.

At the close of Mr. Frothingham's address, Col. Martin, of the Committee on Finance, spoke of the expenses, which was followed by a collection.

Mr. W. J. Potter, Secretary of the Association, presented the annual reports of the same, which could be had at the door. He also stated that Max Mueller, the eminent scholar, occupied the same platform practically. He spoke of the breadth of the organization, and presented as an illustration the fact that its meetings in Cincinnati were opened in the Hebrew Temple.

Mr. Potter alluded to the politeness and generosity of the Catholics of this city in postponing their Fair, that the Society might have the hall, and, on behalf of the Association, tendered to these people the thanks of the same.

Mr. Frothingham, the President, then recommended THE INDEX, published at Toledo by F. E. Abbot, after which he introduced Mr. Abbot, who spoke a few minutes very effectively of liberty and union in Church and State. He spoke of the spirit of our institutions, and claimed that, while yearning for political freedom and purity, we also yearned inwardly for social and religious freedom and fraternity.

This closed the meeting, beside the announcements.—Indianapolis Journal.

FRIDAY SESSIONS, NOV. 4.

MORNING SESSION.

The audience yesterday morning was not a very large one, there being not over 150 persons in the hall at any time during the session. Much interest was manifested in the proceedings by all who were in attendance, and now and then, as the speakers uttered something that was in sympathy with the opinion of the audience, there were bursts of applause, but in the main very little enthusiasm was exhibited. At half-past 10 o'clock the Association was called to order by President O. B. Frothingham, of New York, and he announced as the subject for discussion—"The Relation of Religion to the State in America," including the question of permitting the Bible to be read in the public schools in this country. He then introduced Miss Lillie Peckham, of Milwaukee, who was delegated to open the debate. Miss Peckham is a rather good looking specimen of femininity, and her essay showed that she possesses a well cultivated mind.

Miss Peckham said:—The public schools are the most powerful weapons of a nation. The very foundation of our republican form of government has its birth-place in our public schools. The question is—Shall the Bible be taught in these schools or not? Let us reason together upon the merits of this subject, and, casting aside all prejudice of caste and sect, seek only for the truth. Now, in this country, we don't want to have any union of Church and State. Our forefathers declared this in the first amendment to the Constitution, and it is one of the fundamental principles of our government. We have given up our faith in Papal infallibility, but it seems that we have not relinquished our faith in the infallibility of the State. What special wisdom has the State that it should choose our religion for us? Have a majority of the people a right to declare the faith that shall be taught the minority? When the Roman Catholic and the Jew pay their school taxes, have they not a right to have a voice in this matter? It is a public inconsistency and a private injustice. There was once a government that legislated on all the affairs of men. I have detected the same feeling in the minds of our opponents to-day. That government was a sort of police force to provide what men should do. But men in this country are able to govern themselves. The reading of the Protestant Bible in the public schools of this country is an acknowledgment of Protestant supremacy. We want no religious supremacy in this country. Has the United States Government the right to prohibit people from having their children instructed in any religious faith they may desire? We should remodel our laws. Were I the most devoted Christian, I should demand a law that should know no sect. In the present state of things there is danger to the schools—danger of the school fund being withdrawn, and the schools destroyed. The Roman Catholics want the Bible out of the schools because they desire the supremacy of their religion.

A movement is on foot to divide the school fund or to take the Bible out of the schools. All who are free from church ties and prejudices will decide it is not just to force the Bible on those who do not believe it. We do not want our school union divided, or our school system scattered into isolated and sectarian schools. So let the Bible go, and so prevent any future war as great as the war for the Union. The sciences, arts, philosophy, law, etc., are what the present age demand as that which should be taught in our schools.

When we demand the exclusion of the Bible from our schools, in favor of the sciences, what justice or expediency can you give to refuse such a request or demand? Now, the question for us to decide is—Shall we endorse the narrow platform of ideas forced upon us, or the broad platform of equality and justice? For my part, I want immutable justice, composed of equality, freedom and brotherhood.

The President then introduced Rev. Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, who said that the ground had been thoroughly gone over by the previous speaker; but that in addition to what had already been said it might be well to consider the subject from some other point of view. Why are there so many advantages for Bible instruction in the public schools, and how did it first get in? It is answered because this is a Christian country; the Bible is what Christianity gets its life from, and therefore it should be read in the schools. This is an excellent argument. It only has one fault, and that is, that it is not true. This is not a Christian country, and I thank God for it, and, if we can do anything to prevent it, it never will be. The Government has never declared itself to be a Christian one; on the contrary, it has expressly declared that it is not. It is a subversion of the cardinal principles of our government to foist the Protestant religion upon those who do not want it. There are those who admit that this country is not Protestant who are nevertheless in favor of having the Bible in the schools, as they say that each person should receive religious education to fit him to act justly towards his fellow-men, and as the Bible is the most widely accepted of any religious work, it should be the text-book adopted. Of course the Association would not admit the ground on which the argument is based. Is there a person here who believes the Bible to be the best book of moral instruction, and would recommend his little daughter to read all parts of it? Of course there is not. I believe that the statement that the Bible is the best text-book of morality is a humbug. If a part is unfit to read, all is unfit.

I fear that we liberals are sometimes led to overestimate the value of the public school system of this country, as it now exists. I do not wish to say anything against the public school, but it is a practical failure. The government makes the man, when the man should make the government, according to the Constitution. I do not believe in public instruction, carried to the extent it is in this country. It is an evil and an injustice.

I do believe in it to a certain extent. I believe in putting tools in the hands of a child—believe in taxing for that and no further. Perhaps the primary school in which are taught the elements of knowledge would be enough. Confine public instruction to this, and then make it compulsory for all children to attend. Give a child a primary education, and if he has the spirit to go forward, he will be assisted.

Mr. Frothingham then stated that the discussion was open, and that the Association liked opposition. No persons availing themselves of the opportunity of responding, the Chairman called on Rowland Connor, of Boston, who said:—

Beecher, Bellows, The Independent, the liberal orthodox papers, The Advance of Chicago, the Jews, all said that the Bible should be taken out of the schools, and that the secular press did not know what to say, but were waiting to be told.

He then went over the old grounds that the Catholics wanted the Bible out of the schools.

The Priests were the old and the first educators, and therefore should be to-day.

All European nations have their national churches, because government and religion went together. But just here the argument fails in regard to America, because civilization is not so identified here. The United States of America knows no theology, and when we talk of national education, we should not think of religion. He did not like any law which was compulsory in having all children go to school, and wanted it changed. He said the theory of our government demanded that it be kept out of our schools; and that, he added, was the gist of the whole argument. He instanced sections of country where Catholics and Chinese were in the majority, and should they not have the same privileges as Protestants in reference to the instruction of children?

He was followed by E. C. Towne, editor of The Examiner, published in Chicago. He said the Bible was a good book, but now it is a bad one, and we don't want a bad book in our schools. It is bad because it is taught that God is shut up in it, and that the Bible is to be worshipped as an idol. He compared the Koran with the Bible, and thought of the two, the Koran was the best. He had read the Bible sixteen times before he was sixteen years of age. He did not like the divisions of the Bible—which in its old purpose as a book for the Jews was pretty good—into chapters and verses, doubtless because it made it much more easy of reference and an aid to those who seek its glorious revelations. He then went on to say that many things in the Bible are licentious, and would not be read if printed in a newspaper. It may be good for heathens, but not for enlightened men. He then stated that the Jews are now convinced that the Bible is a human book. He compared the Bible with the productions of men of to-day, as the light of a candle is to the noonday sun.

He was followed by remarks from a gentleman in the audience, who stated that there were in the United States only one of the so-called Christians to ten of the population.

William J. Potter, of New Bedford, being called on by the Chair, said, among other things, that he did not know that the Bible was so bad a book as Mr. Towne said it was, and that he presumed the reason that he had never discovered it was because he had never read the book clear through.

He was followed by Mr. Vickers, in reply to questions asked by Mr. Blanchard, who said that if this country was intended to be a Christian one, the founders would have said so; but that the Government said afterwards that it was in no sense a Christian Government.

Mr. Frothingham said—We have only hinted at this great question: Is it right for this Government to appoint chaplains in the army or Legislature? He stated that the origin of this country was not from England, but from infidel France.

He then announced the Convention adjourned until half-past 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The topic for the afternoon session was—"The Battle of Free Religion against Dogmatism and Superstition."

The Rev. F. E. Abbot, of Toledo, opened the discussion.

Rev. O. B. Frothingham spoke at some length of the superstition which pervades the religious world, and of the necessity that it should be removed before the world could make any substantial progress.

Col. J. O. Martin then read an essay on the subject under discussion, which was a most able effort, and showed evidence of deep thought and research on the part of its author.

Mr. Towne thought that superstition and dogmatism make of the popular Christian Church of to-day a den of thieves and murderers. He used the words in the same sense that Christ used them when he said to the Jews, his co-religionists, that they made of the temple a den of thieves, and when he said that he that loveth not his brother is a murderer. The adherents of the popular Christianity will take a man's living away from him and starve him to death, if he does not subscribe to their doctrines.

These things are going on all over the country every day in the name of Jesus. They ought to make that name infamous, and would make it infamous if it were not so enveloped in the broadest, purest, most heavenly charity. This is what he was determined to fight as long as he lived, and with all his might.

EVENING SESSION.

A larger assembly than had been present at any of the previous sessions was gathered in the hall last evening. The addresses were listened to with marked attention, and were frequently applauded.

Col. Martin stated that these friends came here without any compensation, and that the expenses of the Convention amounted to $80 or $90. The payment of the expenses devolved upon the resident friends of the cause. Therefore a collection would be taken up before the opening of the meeting, and he hoped that the audience would make liberal contributions.

After the collection had been taken up, the President announced Rev. E. C. Towne, of Chicago, who opened the discussion on the subject—"Will the Coming Man Attend Church?" Mr. Towne said:—

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—It is to be assumed that any man who attempts to answer this question will give his individual opinion whether he himself would go, should he be among the coming men. He would go if he did not get to a Free Religious Association first. But does the existing man go to church? He had been told that seven people out of eight in this city do not go to church. Not one in forty go to the communion table. The church, in a strict sense, is already deserted by thirty-nine of forty persons. An eminent man of this country, who is distinguished in public life, had told him that he had not been to church in twenty-nine years. He himself liked to go to church, whether the minister preached according to his idea or not. But he did not go, because he did not receive kind treatment there. Jesus said the hour cometh, and now is, that man will worship God in spirit and in truth. The coming man will find the Bible as used in the popular churches, that is, as an infallible book, as an image of God, is not believed. The coming man can't acknowledge Jesus as an infinite being, nor can he believe the various religious creeds. He will not enter the church, because in order to do so, he will be compelled to believe the Divine Book, the Divine Mediator, the Divine Creed, and the Divine Church. The coming man will be more human and humane; more sympathetic with his fellow-beings; a pure, great-hearted lover of his race. He will be so absorbed in working for his fellow-men that he will have no time to work for himself. It is greater to have hope, love and faith to our fellow-men than to do anything else. Though it were proven to us that there was no God, it would still be our duty to love one another during our existence. He believed that when we learned how to unselfishly love our fellow-men, we will understand that love is greater than God.

The Roman Catholic Church deserves great praise for its humanity. He honored that church for it. But, in general, the sentiment of the existing church was not humane. The church is the receptacle of genteel humanity, and has no mercy for humble sinners. He had been brought up in the extreme orthodox faith, and had studied and tried to fit himself in every way to defend that faith. He had relinquished his adherence to the orthodox church through observation of its inhumanity to the outside world. He referred to a poem, which is approved of by the Evangelical Church, and said that if he should read passages from the same, the audience would leave the hall more horror-stricken than if he should commit a cold-blooded murder on the stage. A church that tolerates that sort of a book the coming man will not attend. The coming man, on account of his humanity, will not go to church, neither will he go to heaven. We want to build upon this structure of humanity. The orthodox church says—Let the sinner go to the bottomless pit of perdition, with the millstone of sin tied to his neck. The coming man will labor and try to coerce sinners into doing right. We cannot say too much to express the infinity of God, but no one must attempt to say that he knows all about God. The church pretends to present an image of God, but he could not believe that it does anything of the kind.

The existing church to the coming man will be as empty as the Catacombs, and useless as the Pyramids of Egypt. John Ruskin says that "the only true church is where one may take his brother's hand helpfully." That church the coming man will bring with him, and it will make the desert blossom like the rose.

Rev. F. E. Abbot said:—Last evening a lady in the audience, upon hearing the subject—"Will the Coming Man Attend Church?"—announced, said it depended upon whether the coming woman does so. He thought that, although this remark was made in jest, there was a great deal of truth in it. Man respects the church-going element in woman. He believed that there would be in the future some kind of worship among us that would be free from dogmatism and formality. When he went into an orthodox church, he was disgusted with the want of real worship. When he went to church, he wanted to find what he called the spirit of worship. He was a minister, but seldom had prayer in his meetings, because he believed in it too much to make it a mere routine. He had heard more blasphemy from the pulpit than he had on the street. He thought that the worship that the coming man will give will be found in his daily life, in his shop, on the road, by the wayside, in the field, etc.

Miss Peckham alluded to the Radical Clubs which have been organized in other cities. It takes but very little to organize them. A few intelligent men and women come together to express their sentiments on this subject of free religion. There is an immense amount of unacknowledged infidelity in America. Men and women fight in silence and in darkness these subjects, which they should battle against together with all the aid the sciences can afford them. She announced herself in favor of ministers' clubs, as they would furnish each of the members new ideas. You ministers have preached us Christ's religion long enough, now preach us yours. Christ's religion would not do for her. She must have her own. No one need tell her that Christ's religion would save her. She only revered Christ as she would any royal and noble man. She blamed Christianity because it takes thoughts that belong to others and claims them as its own. God would have as soon walked in the rain which he sends upon the just and unjust, as to have withheld his truth from one class of people and given it to another.

Rev. Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, said he was convinced that the coming man would attend church—that is, his idea of the church of the future—the church that will be fast anchored to this earth, and will have but very little regard for heaven or hell as places apart from this earth—the church that will clasp realities, and cease to clutch at dreams and phantoms.

The coming church will not prostitute nature for the serving of God. It will affirm that religion does not necessarily include the recognition of the existence of God. It will not insult humanity by such abominable theories as the present church does. The coming church will not be a communion of saints. There will be no goats on the left hand, and, thank God! no sheep on the right. It will have got rid of the sheep theory, and therefore will have no need of pastors or shepherds. Whatever the church of the future may be, it will not be a believing church; it will think a great deal more of knowing than believing.

The coming church will not taboo science and philosophy; it will be a learner. It will also be a popular teacher and the most efficient agent of diffusing scientific knowledge. But it will not be a praying machine. As the church gets rid of the popular conception of God, it will get rid of the popular notion of His interference with human affairs. Coupled with the idea of a flat earth and overhanging heavens, there is an idea of a God who sits up there, watching the machinery go on, and oils and tends it. The coming church will recognize that it is just as rational to ask God for a horse or a cow as to ask for humanity.

Rowland Connor supposed that the coming man, if he attended church at all, would of course go on Sunday. Men nowadays worked and toiled in the race for wealth, and went to church on the Sabbath. He dwelt upon the dreariness of Sunday to the children of strict Christian parents, and how he grew to hate that day when a child himself, because he was so restricted and restrained during its continuance. He implored fathers and mothers to use their best efforts to make Sunday a bright and beautiful day for their children. If they would only do this, he would not care so much whether they went to church or not. He did not believe that it was possible for a minister to speak an hour every Sunday, and speak well. He believed that in the coming church ministers would use every effort to have the sermons animated and interesting, and would do this by inviting their co-laborers to occupy their pulpits. He related of a Sunday school that was presided over by an atheist and spiritualist, which was conducted in perfect harmony, and said that it was a lesson to orthodox Christians, and was the result of free religion.

The Rev. O. B. Frothingham reviewed at some length the proceedings of the Association during the Convention, calling the audience to bear witness to the frank, bold, liberal manner in which they had presented their thoughts. He hoped those who had heard the words of the speakers would ponder upon the same, and if they found in them that which seemed right, they would act upon them. He then pronounced the Convention adjourned.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

THE TOLEDO CONVENTION

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

MONDAY EVENING SESSION, NOV. 7.

A large and attentive audience assembled last night at Gitskey's Opera House to listen to discourses by Rev. William J. Potter and Rev. O. B. Frothingham upon Free Religion, introductory to the Convention of the Free Religious Association, which is now being held in this city.

On motion, Hon. Richard Mott presided, and after a few introductory remarks as to the character, aims, and objects of the Convention, he introduced the Rev. Mr. Potter.

MR. POTTER'S ADDRESS.

He introduced the subject of his remarks by a brief statement concerning the origin of the Free Religious Association, the principles which it involves, and the object for which this Convention was called, and which it was intended to represent. The Free Religious Association, he said, was formed in Boston in the spring of 1867. He did not mean to say that the movement then first began, or that they organized the movement; but on the contrary we should say that the movement of the true Free Religion had been a long time in the world, and that this Association came rather out of the movement than that it made the movement; and although the Society was formed in Boston, it was not intended to be a Boston Society, but was represented by two members who resided in Ohio, Rabbi Wise and Francis E. Abbot; and that upon its organization its proceedings were published not only in Boston, but in the New York papers, inviting all those who wished perfect freedom in religion to come and give a helping hand to the cause. He said at those meetings there were represented liberal Unitarians, Spiritualists, and others; and that at their second meeting, in 1868, they received a letter from Chunder Sen, of India, assuring them of his fellowship in their cause.

He said that the Association was not of any sectarian creed whatever, but allowed each to think for himself without forcing him, and that when we allow that principle, we assert the principles of the Association. For illustration, he would say that their Constitution provides—

1. This Association shall be called the Free Religious Association—its objects being to promote the interest of pure religion; to encourage the scientific study of theology; and to increase fellowship in the spirit; and to this end all persons interested in these objects are cordially invited to its membership.

2. Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other Associations.

Any person desiring to co-operate with this Association shall be considered a member, with full right to speak in its meetings.

The speaker said these were the cardinal principles of the Association, and that these principles had met with a warm response here in the West, and indeed from what he had noticed in Indianapolis and Cincinnati, he thought they had obliterated effectively the idea that this was merely a "New England clique."

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S ADDRESS.

The President of the Convention then introduced the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, of Boston, President of the Association. He spoke in very flattering terms of the reception the Association had received in the West, and that he had been requested again and again to visit Chicago, where he was assured they would have a warm welcome. He also stated that the idea of Free Religion existed elsewhere than in America, stating that he had been receiving from time to time copies of a weekly paper published in Milan, Italy, setting forth the same ideas, and, although it was somewhat informal in organization, yet carrying on missionary operations in precisely this interest of perfect freedom of faith. As individuals each one had his own faith, and a very distinct one. He did not pretend that all their faith corresponds.

Mr. Frothingham then referred to Mr. Abbot in terms of eulogy, and as being one of the officers of the Association; yet that whatever he might say or publish, the Association was not responsible for his opinions, but that they stood side by side in the fellowship of faith. He said one of us may be a Jew and preach in the Hebrew Temple in Cincinnati, and another may be of some other church—Catholic or Protestant, if you please—and yet each man stands upon this principle independent of the church, because our truths exist, and each one arrives at them by his own conclusions, and each feels his truth. This, then, is our position. When Paul started out on his mission of travelling, his plan was to address himself to the Jew; and it was only when he found that the Jews did not receive his word, that he turned his faith, and then it was that he took up his gospel for all the world, and not for the Jews alone; and so it may happen that we may be misunderstood and misrepresented by Christians whose word should be liberal, as there is no more fellowship between faiths than there was a century ago. "I tell you," said the speaker, "it is a mistake to suppose that sectarianism is growing weaker. When Chunder Sen was in England, a rush was made by these conservatives to obtain his services, not with a desire to affiliate in fellowship with this theist, but in order that they might fill their chapel up with large audiences to see this great theistical phenomenon."

The speaker then dwelt at some length upon the similarity found to exist between the Bible, the Koran, the Oriental writings of the East, and the writings of Confucius, saying also that the organizations of Christians are simply grouped together politically, that they have no cohesion. It must be organic.

Again he said, "we speak of the church as feminine; he wanted it to be masculine. The Roman Catholic Church had promulgated its doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin, a woman phenomenon." Again, he said they had been charged with being scientists, with being intellectual; but he desired to be ten times more intellectual than he was; he wanted to be able to go down deep into this world's faith, until he got at the human nature out of which all these faiths have grown.

We have attempted only to give a very brief abstract of this discussion—our space not admitting of a full report.

To-day there will be three sessions. One will be held at 10 o'clock A. M.; the subject will be, "Religion under the Law of Reason and Common Sense," and the discussion will be opened by Rev. Rowland Connor, of Boston, who will be followed by others. At 3 o'clock another session will be held; subject, "The True and False Use of the Sunday." Rev. Thomas Vickers, of Cincinnati, will open this discussion.

At 7 o'clock in the evening the last session will be held, with the topic, "Will the Coming Man attend Church?" Miss Lillie Peckham will open the discussion, which will be free to all.

TUESDAY SESSIONS, NOV. 8.

MORNING SESSION.

The Convention was opened yesterday morning at 10 o'clock, with a small audience. The topic for discussion was "Religion under the Law of Reason and Common Sense." President Frothingham introduced Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, of Cincinnati.

THE RABBI

Read an address upon the above subject, from which we have made a few selections.

[The essay was published in full in last week's INDEX.—ED.]

ADDRESS OF REV. ROWLAND CONNOR.

The original chemist was an alchemist, expending his time, money and energies in trying to find the Philosopher's Stone; and we are beginning to work at the other end of the matter. We start, as our President said last night, with one faith. We apply ourselves to the study of man, and, if not to say too much, with the study of God; and when we apply it upon that infallible book, we will place ourselves under his influence, with what is contained in the book. Reason has said the word, ages sustained it. In some States they are in the habit of swearing a witness in their courts with his right hand on the Bible, and afterward to kiss the book. If the witness should swear falsely, the book would not help the matter. The book adds nothing. A witness may swear to a truth or a falsehood, nevertheless. This only adds dogma and superstition. Free Religion stands ready to strike down all this. It stands with a drawn dagger, ready to plunge it into any old coffin filled with bones of superstition. Let reason bring to us infallibility; let all the methods of induction be applied to religion as it is applied to other matters; this is reason, and only in this way will man ever reach true religion.

REMARKS OF G. B. STEBBINS.

The next speaker introduced by the President was G. B. Stebbins, of Detroit, who said:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—This is a free platform; I could heartily wish that all were as free as this. I could wish that we had in our midst all denominations and all creeds, and that would be to my mind a free religion; but we cannot have it so, and we enter upon the discussion of truth, represented by a few. When I speak of truth, I mean the moral desires which reach beyond this life. We are here limited to no creeds; we are here to take in all past and modern improvements. When you go down here to one of our large shipyards, you will find building new ships to take the place of old ones, with all the best improvements and modern conveniences of the time, having some one or more things as improvements over its predecessors. So it is with the mechanic when he puts up a building, and the mathematical instrument-maker, in making his telescope, searches the world for the latest inventions to apply in building his instrument; he has appliances for measuring the lens and the tube; for grinding and polishing the lens, he uses his utmost powers of reason; in making calculations of the proper adjustment of the focus, he studies to know all its laws. Why? Because of the reward. If, when he gets his instrument done, he turns it towards the heavens and discovers a star which no one has found, this, then, is his reward.

We want to know man here and his hereafter. Where is truth? Is it in the Bible? Doubtless there may be some truths there; if so, then we must turn to those truths only. We should endeavor to find all its hidden sources. So it seems to me, that our great work is to move around in the great cycles of truth to discover more. Not venerating the old relics of the past, and hunting up treasures for the present and the future, we want to use our own faculties. We want respect for ourselves.

The remark was made last night by our President that the Free Religionists had been accused of being intellectualists. I wish we were all a great deal more intellectual. I agree entirely with the President, when he says that he wants a masculine religion, although I cannot but be frank in saying that we have a masculine religion. What we do want, is a masculine and feminine religion, embracing both sexes.

Short addresses were also made by Rev. W. J. Potter, Rev. E. C. Towne, Rev. F. E. Abbot, Rev. Thos. Vickers, and Rev. O. B. Frothingham, when the Convention adjourned about 12:30 until 3 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

A somewhat larger audience was in attendance in the afternoon. The discussion was somewhat interrupted by the noise made by the rain falling upon the roof, rendering it very difficult at times to hear the speakers.

The subject for the afternoon discussion was "The True and False Use of Sunday."

REV. THOMAS VICKERS, OF CINCINNATI,

Was introduced to the audience by the President as leading the discussion, and he read mostly from manuscript.

[The essay is elsewhere published in full. In reporting Mr. Vickers' comments on the "Blue Laws of Connecticut," the editor of the Commercial interjected the following remark:—

"The speaker appears to have been imposed upon by a volume of bulesque 'Blue Laws,' printed in Connecticut many years since."

We give this remark without endorsing it.—ED.]

Rabbi Wise then took the floor to speak upon the subject. He said he did not understand how it is, that the Congress of the United States has given to the District of Columbia several more holidays than the balance of us have—such as Good Friday, Thanksgiving, etc. For his part he could not see how it was. He thought there was no lady or gentleman within his hearing that would not say that Congress has taken upon itself an authority which was not warranted. He could very easily understand why the religions had their days, but why should a government legislate upon the matter? He held that no man had a right to prescribe to another man what he should not do on the Sabbath day.

Mr. Cross then took the floor, and was followed by Mr. Stebbins, Miss Lillie Peckham, Mr. Rowland Connor, Rev. E. C. Towne, Rev. Mr. Abbot, and Rev. O. B. Frothingham.

After which the Convention adjourned until 7 o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The meeting last evening, as per announcement, was devoted to the question, "Will the Coming Man go to Church?" Miss Lillie Peckham delivered the opening address in the discussion.

[Miss Peckham's essay will be printed next week.—ED.]

REMARKS OF REV. MR. FROTHINGHAM.

Rev. Mr. Frothingham asked for a collection to be taken up while he made some remarks upon the question under consideration. He stated that the people do not attend church. In New York city he had visited intelligent families—and found frequently that not a single man in a whole block attended church. It is the men of culture and refinement who do not go to church. The middle grade—those of ecclesiastical training—go to church, some from the mere force of habit, some because their wives go, and some for one reason and some another. If the present man does not go to church, certainly the future man will not.

The Catholic goes to church because he expects to get something for going there. He expects to be released from the legitimate effects of his sins. He goes to get a ticket which will carry him to "kingdom come." The Protestant goes to church from a similar motive. He thinks there is merit in the act of going to church and listening to a sermon. They have so many different church organizations—so many different roads—that men get confused, and by the number of trains they scarcely know at what office to buy their tickets.

Another reason why men do not go to church is because thinking minds do not believe that religion consists so much in what a man thinks as what he is. The coming man will go to church. Men will be called to preach, and when they utter inspiring truths the people will go and hear them.

REV. MR. ABBOT

Was introduced, and read a letter from Lucretia Mott, giving the reasons for her absence, and expressing her sympathy with the objects of the meeting, after which he made some remarks upon the question under consideration, claiming that the future church will be a hall without a steeple, and sermons will be superseded by essays.

REV. MR. POTTER.

Rev. Mr. Potter thought the question might well be, "Will there be any church in the future?" Has not society outgrown the need of a church? Certainly something must be done to reform the church before it will draw the coming man to it. He had heard the opinion expressed that the coming man will not have a church. The pulpit does not furnish men of first-class talent. It does not keep pace with newspapers, magazines, or books, and thereby loses its attractiveness and fails to exert an influence over men. The coming church, in order to meet these new demands, will be so different from the old that they will hardly know each other.

One reason why the churches of today do not meet the wants of the people, is their lack of virtue, of common sense, and because they devote more effort to saving souls hereafter than to helping the needy and oppressed in this life. They have not lifted a hand to help in humanitarian movements, but have always stood in the way. Their whole superstructure is based upon pious selfishness. The question constantly before their minds is, "Is My Soul Safe?"

The church of the future is to be the church of humanity. It must lift up the fallen. It must remove the pews from its churches and fill their places with sewing machines, where poor women can learn to sew, and thus be enabled to comfortably support themselves. The mission of the church will be to lift up the fallen—to do good wherever opportunity offers.

MR. STEBBINS,

Of Detroit, was the next speaker, and he differed with those who had preceded him and ignored the doctrine of a future existence. He advocated the doctrine of those known as "spiritualists," but outside from this his views coincided with those of the speakers who preceded him.

REV. MR. VICKERS

Said the Future Church will wipe out a geographical hell and heaven. It will care very little about either of these imaginary places, but will stand firmly on its legs here in this world. He really did not believe there would be any church in the future. Upon that subject he felt like saying—"Blessed are they that expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed." All men will then stand upon an equal footing. The pulpit will not be required to speak for the Jews, and the Jews will not be compelled to endorse all that comes from the pulpit.

REV. DR. WISE

Was called out and spoke earnestly for a short time, contending that no church will be needed in the future—that the State will become a humanitarian organization, caring for the wants of the poor, providing against the necessity for poverty, and furnishing the means for the education of all to a degree which shall lift them above the grossness of the present day. He believed in a future and in a supreme creative power. There is a feeling in every man's breast which teaches him this.

The attendance was quite large and the speakers were frequently greeted with hearty applause. At about 11 o'clock the Convention adjourned.

The meetings of this Convention were not opened with prayer, nor were they closed with benediction, neither did they have singing. In fact there was a total absence of everything bearing any resemblance to what we are accustomed to see and hear at religious meetings.—Toledo Commercial.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The Society will meet next Sunday, November 27, at 7 1-2 o'clock, in Gitskey's Opera House. Mr. Abbot will read an essay in continuation of last Sunday's subject:—"What place does Christianity hold among the true Causes of Modern Civilization?" The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The subject of discussion will be—"The Sunday School, and how to sustain it." Meeting immediately after that of the Independent Society.

SOCIAL MEETING.—The members of the Independent Society will meet at Mrs. S. D. Curtis's, on Michigan street, Wednesday evening, November 23. All interested in the re-opening of the Free Schools are specially desired to be present.

Poetry.

THE VOICE OF NOVEMBER.

Darksome and sombre is the day's declining,
Thick on the lawn the russet leaves lie dead,
And heaven's broad arch, that late with gold was shining,
Spans the drear town with dull and rayless lead.

Down the steep hills the mist creeps low and lower,
And wraps the hemlocks in its folds of gloom;
The fields forget the reaper and the sower,
And the sick year is crawling to its tomb.

Like crownless kings that ponder ancient losses,
Upstretching their gaunt arms to pitiless skies,
Clad in scant garb of gray and olive mosses,
Wrinkled and lean, the dripping elms uprise.

Dull on the roof the tireless rain-drops mutter,
Tiring the mind with melancholy sound,
While, lulled from speech and nuts and constant flutter,
The drowsy parrot slumbers on its round;

And mute and musing broods the hushed canary,
Nor for the tempting sugar quits its stand;
And at the oriel pane our household fairy
Poutingly props her chin upon her hand.

Alas! my soul repeats the outward murmur,
And moves through all her depths with nameless pain;
And that which, buffeted by fate, grew firmer,
Now droops and quivers at the droning rain.

For stirrings vague of life's unanswered questions
Keep time and rhythm with its swift, pattering feet,

Perplexing brain and heart with dim suggestions,
Elusive gleams, and whisperings incomplete,—

Reviving crushed desires and old surmises
And murdered hopes unresting in their graves,— Veiling the grandeur of life's sacrifices,— Stealing the sunlight from the Future's waves,—

Waking a blind, unconquerable yearning,
Reachings for more than worlds and systems yield,
Grasping at stars, and heats of inward burning,
Clutchings at lustres vast and unrevealed.

Alas! to Nature's deep, mysterious senses,
To the grand lessons of the skies and spheres,
To God's benign, eternal utterances,
I can but answer with unbidden tears.

O Thou who, in the rainbow robe of beauty
That decks the years in their sweet youth and prime,

Weavest deep hints of love and faith and duty,
Foregleamings of our destiny sublime,—

Who in the organ symphonies of ocean,
In trill of brooks, and carolling of birds,
In breeze, and insect's hum, and music's motion,
Revealest truths that are too deep for words!

Touch more profoundly my cloud-darkened spirit,
That even in fog and gloom and rain and wind,
Skilled to interpret Thee, I may inherit Meanings more precious than the gems of Ind!

FREE RELIGION ON THE STREET.

[We give to the following advertisement, published in the Toledo Commercial Saturday morning, Nov. 12, one insertion in THE INDEX gratis. If they carry on business at the "Square Dealing Store" on free religious principles, and do not put all their square dealing into their name, we have no doubt that the proprietors will succeed by deserving success.—ED.]

FREE RELIGION!

That man should "agree to disagree," is well enough, I have no doubt; but where the good comes, I can't see, to have our Sabbath day wiped out. But, if you love your fellow-man and would do them good as ne'er before, tell them truly that they can buy clothing cheap at the Square Dealing Store, 123 Summit Street.

A petrified cat was found under the floor, near the pulpit of an old church in Newtown, Conn. A petrified Catechism might be found under a great many other pulpits and churches.

The Index.

NOVEMBER 26, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our first number is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

A NEW LIBERAL SOCIETY.

We are pleased to be informed that, through the energy and earnestness of Mr. R. H. Ranney and a few others of equal faith in ideas, a new liberal organization has just been formed under the name of the "Independent Society of Ashfield, Massachusetts." It already numbers thirty members, with a fair prospect of more; and a subscription paper is going round for the purpose of securing speakers as opportunity offers. The following is the Constitution or articles of association:—

"We, the undersigned, residents of Ashfield and vicinity, in perfect charity with all our neighbors, hereby unite ourselves for the purpose of social, scientific, moral and religious inquiry by means of meetings, debates, and addresses, in such manner as may be found most convenient.

Being firmly persuaded that no statement of truth is final, and that the only rule of the highest human development is 'to prove all things,' we hope, by impartially considering all honest views upon every subject of human interest, to become better men and women, and more truly useful members of society.

We agree (each male member) to pay one dollar annually towards the necessary expenses of our Association, which shall be called the 'Independent Society of Ashfield;' and when twenty persons shall have signed this agreement, they shall appoint by a majority vote a Secretary and Treasurer to discharge the usual duties of those offices, and an Executive Committee of three to carry into effect the resolutions of the Society."

Under these articles, which are very excellent, and show not only the fullest sympathy with the free religious movement, but also the most complete comprehension of it, the following officers have been elected:

SECRETARY—Wait Bement; TREASURER—Asa P. Wait; EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE—R. H. Ranney, Leonard Church, Nelson Gardner.

We congratulate our friends on the fair commencement of their Society, and trust that the highest and best success may attend their efforts to carry out its objects. Nothing could be finer than the spirit and tone of the above articles, which strike the key-note of unity in diversity—that grand music of the future for which the world is even now listening with strained attention. May all discords be at last lost in the growing harmony!

Mr. A. Bronson Alcott, of Concord, Mass., recently visited Toledo. On Saturday evening, November 12, he held one of his characteristic "conversations" in the pleasant parlors of Mrs. S. D. Curtis, and on the following evening made an address on "New England Authors" to a large audience in Gitskey's Opera House. His reminiscences of Thoreau were particularly interesting, being imparted in a style delightful from its mingled tenderness and humor. The veteran idealist retains all the fresh enthusiasm of youth, a little tempered but not cooled by his long experience of life; and we rejoice that he is still able and willing to give to Western audiences such vivid conceptions of a coterie of thinkers and writers who have forever identified themselves with the intellectual history of America. All honor to these pioneers of thought, whose fame makes so large a part of the true glory of our country!

The unavoidable omission of our "Communications," resulting from the publication of the Convention reports and essays, has caused an accumulation on our hands of many excellent articles. In fact, we have for some months been in receipt of far more than we could possibly print. We shall do the best we can for our contributors, whom we sincerely thank for their favors, and nearly all of whose contributions we should gladly publish, if we had room. Nothing could be more encouraging to us than to perceive how much excellent thought has been called out by THE INDEX in the form of communications. As we anticipated, most of the writers are new ones, not previously known to the public through any publications with which we are acquainted; and the high average of excellence they exhibit confirms our previous conviction of the wide diffusion of radical thought in this country. At the same time, our files show an array of names of high moral and literary reputation which cannot but command the respect of the most unfriendly critics.

"Rev. Mr. Chaney, of Hollis Street Church, in the Unitarian National Conference, giving the report of the Suffolk Conference, said: 'The Horticultural Hall meetings, though strongly opposed in some quarters, also conquered opposition, and proved valuable aids in the work.'

So he indorses, as part of the cultus of his Church, the most free religion and skeptical lectures ever delivered in this city, exceeding Theodore Parker's in infidelity. It would seem that there was no need of going farther."

The Boston Spitfire (we beg pardon, we should say the Boston Watchman and Reflector), from which we clip the above, darts its wrathful flames at nothing—as usual. Rev. Mr. Chaney did not refer to the heretical "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," but to certain Unitarian meetings, presided over by Rev. James Freeman Clarke, which happened to be held in the same hall. We trust the health of our Baptist contemporary will not seriously suffer from its own spiteful and futile fling, though, as Gen. Butler well said, "it wrenches a man awfully to kick at nothing."

Several hundred extra copies of last week's INDEX and SUPPLEMENT were struck off, containing the report of the essays and discussions at the late Conventions of the Free Religious Association. They can be had at three cents a copy on orders for fifty copies or upwards.

Our subscription list is now rapidly increasing; and if our friends will only make vigorous exertions, THE INDEX will be soon placed upon a permanent basis, and made a powerful instrumentality in the religious emancipation of America.

The names of seventy-seven Unitarian ministers are on our mail-list.

SUNDAY—ITS USES AND ABUSES.

[An Essay by Rev. Thomas Vickers, read at the Toledo Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

In Paul's time, Ephesus was the metropolis of Asia. It was the great central mart for all the merchants of the East and West. People flocked to it from all parts of the earth. Its temple—dedicated to Artemis, or Diana, as we are accustomed to call her—was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world. Set on fire by Herostratus and burnt to the ground, it had been rebuilt by the citizens with greater magnificence than ever, the women contributing their trinkets, the men their property, and the artists their work. It was filled with the most exquisite specimens of ancient art, the altar being almost covered with the wonderful productions of Praxiteles. This particular Diana, of the Ephesians, was one of the most widely known and most universally worshipped of all the popular divinities; her statue was said to have fallen from heaven. It was the custom to set up miniature copies of the temple and statue in silver as shrines in the houses, and for those going on a journey to wear them as amulets. These were made in Ephesus, and sold to all comers. It was a very extensive business and a source of profit to a large class of artists and laborers.

It was in this city that the great Apostle to the Gentiles lived for the greater part of three years, making it the centre for numerous excursions into the neighboring cities. Here, in the birth-place and home of poets, philosophers and artists—where Apelles painted his immortal pictures, Hipponax wrote his biting satires, and Heraclitus brooded over the great problems of the universe—Paul preached with such power and met with such signal success, that all who were immediately interested in the maintenance of the popular religion, its cultus, and the poetry and art connected with it, were struck with consternation. The very first to take fright were the men who made the miniature temples. A certain Demetrius, who seems to have owned a shrine factory, got his fellow-manufacturers and the workmen together, and held an "indignation meeting." He made a flaming speech, telling them, if this thing was allowed to go on, they were ruined men. "This Paul," he said, "is persuading multitudes, not only here but everywhere in Asia, that these things made by human hands are not gods. What is to become of us, and what of the great goddess Diana, whom the whole world worships, and whose image and temple everybody buys, if we cannot put a hook in this man's mouth, and prevent him from speaking?" Then the workmen and the loafers and roughts who had been attracted by the gathering, began to cry—"Great is the Diana of the Ephesians!" "Down with the Atheists!" Soon the whole city was in an uproar; the mob, increasing every moment, rushed to the amphitheatre, laying violent hands on two of Paul's companions by the way. Here they clamored for hours. It was utterly impossible to obtain a hearing. Whenever any one attempted to speak, his voice was drowned by the deafening cry, "Great is the Diana of the Ephesians!" You all know what such mobs are.

How often these scenes have been repeated in the history of religion! In the history of the Christian religion oftener, I think, than anywhere outside of it. The church has always had her Ephesian Diana in some form or other. When Luther uttered his protest against indulgences, and said that these things were made by human hands, and in no sense divine or divinely authorized, what an uproar it made, how the ecclesiastical mob shouted—"Great is the Pope, God's vicegerent, who hath power to forgive sins!" When men said that the Bible had not fallen from heaven, and refused any longer to worship it, what a howl went up from the shrine-makers—"Great is the Bible! It's God's word! Down with the Infidels!"

And yet, God be praised! one after another the idols are falling. Intelligent ecclesiastics can scarcely keep up the old forms without laughing in each other's faces. It is only the ministerial mob which any longer believes in the plenary inspiration of the Bible. The rest would be glad to have at least half of it expunged. As one prop after another fails, the men who manage the institution are all the more anxious to strengthen those that remain. Hence the anxiety and clamor nowadays in regard to "the observance of the Sabbath." This is one of the strongholds of ecclesiasticism. It is, in reality, only one of the outworks, but it is the key to the whole fortification; if it falls, the position is lost, and ecclesiasticism becomes a thing of the past. So long as the ecclesiastical Sabbath is a recognized institution, protected and supported by law, the power of the priesthood is unbroken, and all the forces of modern science cannot overthrow it.

If the priesthood can only cajole the people into surrendering one day in seven to the uses of the church, they have won the day. For if the laboring man, the mechanic, gives up this very day on which he is most free to think and reflect on the problems of life—if he gives up Sunday entirely to church-going and to such exercises as the church prescribes, to hearing what the minister has to say in the sanctuary and reading the publications of the Tract Society at home, how can he be anything more than the echo of the minister and the Tract Society? The priesthood knows that, if it can control Sunday's thinking and reading, its existence is safe. And so whoever proposes any reform which tends to take this control out of its hands, is met with storms of vituperation and abuse; the cry is raised—"Great is the Sabbath! God himself rested on it! Down with the Sabbath-breakers!"

The ecclesiastical theory of Sunday may be very briefly summed up. It is that the day on which the thing is done determines the moral quality of the action. In other words, there are certain things which, when done on the first day of the week, are particularly wicked in their eyes, though not wicked at all when done on the other days of the week. One of the most wicked is the issuing of newspapers on Sunday. To take and read such is a high-handed offence against the Almighty. They are said, without exception, to be "doing the work of infidelity, and fostering vice and irreligion." To the "atheism and licentiousness of the German press," in particular, there are said to be no bounds. Furthermore, the running of railroad trains, street cars and omnibuses on Sunday, for the convenience and benefit of those who have no other mode of conveyance, is also a great sin. "The tramp of the iron horse crushes out the Decalogue, and the noise of the steam whistle drowns the voice of God"—which, in plain words, means, I suppose, the voice of the minister. "Valuable as the locomotive may be," these men tell us, "it is less valuable than the Decalogue; and if it cannot do its appointed work without running over 'the tables of stone,' it were better that it never run at all." But Sunday recreations and amusements are, above all things, desperately wicked. Through them "the day of holy rest is turned into a Saturnalia." Sunday must be in no sense a holiday; for a holiday can never be a holyday, although they mean precisely the same thing, it being only a different way of spelling one and the same word. If the Public Parks are kept open on Sunday, as, for instance, the Central Park in New York, there must be no pleasure boats on the lakes, no licensed carriages for Sunday drives, and no houses of refreshment for Sunday visitors, no bands of music to charm the ear and hold the passions and the appetites in check. Furthermore, on Sunday there must be no improvement of the mind, except such as comes through the dronings of the minister or the publications of the Bible and Tract Societies. Public Libraries, Reading Rooms, Museums, Zoological and Botanical Gardens, Galleries of Painting and Sculpture, and Theatres must all be closed. Some of them, it is true, are indispensable to the education and cultivation of mankind on weekdays—even the Sabbatarians admit this—but on Sundays they are all an abomination in the sight of the Lord, not to be tolerated in a Christian community. There must be no Sabbath journeys, no Sabbath visiting, no Sabbath letter-writing, no love-making, no business transacted, however pressing, no mirth and rejoicing; nothing but preaching, praying, psalm-singing, church-going, calm sedateness and quiet meditation on religious themes.

Or, in other words, the Sabbatarians practically propose a new Decalogue, which, I have sometimes thought, might be expressed somewhat after the following fashion:—

Thou shalt have no Sunday but the Sunday of the Church.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, such as billiards, ten-pins, cards, or dice; for the church is a jealous church, and visits the billiard and card player with her wrath, but she exhibits kindness to them that love her and keep her commandments.

Thou shalt not take the name of the preacher in vain, for the preacher will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

Remember the first day of the week (which is not the Sabbath day), to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the day of the church: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter: but thy man-servant shall attend to thy chariot and thy horses early in the morning, and shall see that thy equipage is in order, and drive thee therein to the sanctuary of the Lord, and he shall wait there, sitting without the temple upon thy chariot, until thou shalt have offered the sacrifice of "a broken and a contrite heart" upon the altar of the Lord; and he shall then drive thee home, that thou mayest fare sumptuously on the repast which thy maid-servant hath prepared for thee in the sweat of her brow.

Honor the church, that thy business may increase, and thy influence be great in the land.

Thou shalt not read the Sunday newspaper.

Thou shalt not dance.

Thou shalt not visit the theatre (except it be to learn its wickedness, that thou mayest the more effectually rebuke it).

Thou shalt not ride in the street car, omnibus, steamboat, or railway train on the day which the church hath sanctified unto herself.

Thou shalt not set thy carnal reason against the doctrines of the church, nor lift thy heel against her, lest thou be utterly destroyed.

My friends, I confess it is difficult not to present the ludicrous side of this movement; there is room for infinite laughter at the absurdities piled mountain-high in which these "blind guides" involve themselves. But, as has been finely said, "there is a laughter which opens into a fountain of tears." Did the vagaries of these men concern nobody but themselves, were there here no supreme interests at stake, were not the cause of humanity involved in the issue, I for one should be content to laugh where I now seek, to the extent of my power, to expose and scourge.

It is not necessary to spend much time over the refutation of the ecclesiastical theory concerning the proper use of Sunday, even from the Christian point of view. The simple fact is, that the ecclesiastical Sabbath is one of the most stupendous frauds which the Protestant Church has to answer for. I say Protestant Church, because the "Christian Sabbath," as it is called, is essentially a Protestant manufacture, and not only essentially Protestant, but also essentially Anglo-American. It was only in England and America that Protestantism was capable of reaching such a degree of barbarism. The Sabbath, as we know it, is an invention of the Puritans. Not one of the great Reformers would have tolerated it for a moment. Luther's opposition to the compulsory observance of Sunday is well known. "It is of no consequence," he says, "whether we rest from labor or not, our consciences are free [from reproach]. Let him who will not rest keep at work, and we will neither scold him nor drive him away." In another place he says—"Keep it holy for its use" sake, both to body and soul. But if anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere any one sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation,—then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit and liberty." So Zwingle was of the opinion that it was better to go to work again after having heard the Sunday's sermon. "If on Sunday," he says, "after having acquitted himself before God, one were to go into his field and mow, reap, make hay, or do any other work which the time called for, I am sure that would be more pleasing to God than loosely idling away one's time. For the believer is above the Sabbath." Calvin was of essentially the same opinion. He said he did not lay so much stress on the septenary Sabbath that he would advise the church to an invariable adherence to it. Nay more, he said: "Christians ought to depart from all superstitious observance of days." The declaration of William Tyndale, the martyr, who first translated the New Testament into English, is still more explicit and emphatic. "As for the Sabbath," he says, "we be lords of the Sabbath, and may yet change it into Monday, or any other day as we see need; or we may make every tenth day holy, if we see cause why. . . . Neither need we any holy day at all, if the people might be taught without it."

Nowhere in the ecclesiastical legislation of the period of the Reformation was Sunday spoken of as better or holier than any other day; nay, there was in almost every instance an express, special declaration to the contrary. Its observance was recommended on entirely practical grounds. Up to the year 1527, the adherents of the Reformation in the city of Ulm worked on Sundays for the very purpose of maintaining their freedom under the gospel.

Down to this period the Sabbath was universally regarded as having been abolished by Christianity. Jesus' opinion in regard to it is known to every intelligent reader of the gospels. With what a jealous eye Paul watched those who were still entangled in the "beggarly elements," those who observed "days" and "times!" He was never sure that he had not bestowed labor upon them in vain. In one of the documents of the early church which has come down to us, Justin Martyr's Dialogue with the Jew Trypho, we find the same feeling expressed. Trypho objects that the Christians, while they pretend to excel others, observe no Sabbaths. Justin replies—"The new law will have you keep a perpetual Sabbath. You, when you have passed a day in idleness, think you are religious. . . . The Lord our God does not take pleasure in such observances. If there is any perjured person or a thief among you, let him cease to be so; if any adulterer, let him repent; then he will have kept the sweet and true Sabbaths of God. (Chap. 12.) You see the elements are never idle, and keep no Sabbaths. If there was no need of Sabbaths before Moses, neither is there now any need of them after Jesus Christ. (Chap. 23.) God directs the government of the universe on this day equally as on all others. (Chap. 29.)"

Now Justin is cherished by the ecclesiastics as one of the chief witnesses for the genuineness of the gospels, but they are very careful to keep such passages as this in the dark—on the Sabbath question Justin is by no means unimpeachable authority. Neander, the Church Historian, who was far from being heterodox in his sympathies or tendencies, says—"The celebration of Sunday, like that of every festival, was a human institution. Far was it from the Apostles to treat it as a divine command; far from them, and far from the first apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday."

How different this from the view which the Blue Laws of Massachusetts and Connecticut took of Sunday! When Luther spoke of those "insane sophists" who "would soon make a sin of selling cabbages or doing any other trifling labor on Sunday," he little thought that in the next century Protestant communities would forbid a husband to kiss his wife, a wife her husband, or a mother her child, on Sunday, under pain of fire or imprisonment. The laws of Connecticut provided that "no one should run on the Sabbath day, or walk in his garden, or elsewhere, except reverently to and from meeting;" that "no one should travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair or shave, on the Sabbath day." If it could be made to appear that any of these sins were committed "proudly, presumptuously, and with a high hand," they were punishable with death.

My friends, I say again that the so-called Christian Sabbath is a stupendous fraud. You cannot take up an ecclesiastical treatise on the subject, a prize essay or tract, issued by any Sabbath Committee or Tract Society, which does not treat the observance of the Sabbath as a special divine command, applicable to all men. History is perverted, the most glaring facts are falsified with shameless impudence, in short, there is no subterfuge, trick, stratagem, or imposture that has not been resorted to for the purpose of keeping this institution in good report. Let me give you one example of the manner in which the facts of the Bible are treated. You will find, in nearly every Sabbath document which considers that special point, the words of Jesus—"The Sabbath was made for man—"adduced as proof that the Sabbath is universally binding; it was "made for man," they say, "that is, for mankind, and therefore not for any particular race of men or period of history; it is just as binding now as it ever was." Now turn to the gospels and see what the obvious meaning of these words is, so obvious that it is morally impossible to misunderstand it. The disciples have been plucking ears of corn to satisfy their hunger on the Sabbath day. Jesus defends them, and says: "The Sabbath was made for man—and not man for the Sabbath." Nobody ever dreamed that he meant to say anything about the universal binding authority of the Sabbath. He said just the opposite. Institutions are made for men, and not men for institutions. They are not and cannot be binding in the sense in which you would make them.

But in spite of this express declaration of Jesus, and in spite of the still more emphatic declaration of his acts, in spite of the whole tenor of apostolic teaching, which nowhere speaks of the Sabbath, be it on the first or on the seventh day of the week, as of divine command, and nowhere, even by implication, recommends it to be devoted to such purposes as the ecclesiastics now devote it to—in spite of all this it is treated and defended as a pre-eminently Christian institution. Having established the claim by fraud, they seek to sustain it by working upon the fears of the less intelligent. God is represented as particularly exacting in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, as wreaking terrible vengeance on all who dare to transgress its laws. He suffers not the smallest dereliction to go unpunished. A man who travels on Sunday is every moment in danger of accident or death, as he would not be under the same circumstances on any other day of the week. For God takes especial pleasure in running railroad trains off the track and blowing up steamboats and upsetting carriages on Sunday. So he does in drowning those who happen to bathe on that day. If a man purposes desecrating the Sabbath by visiting his friends in a neighboring town, God breaks his leg the day before, so that he is glad enough to stay at home. If a farmer, his rusting the weather, gets in his hay or his grain on Sunday, God sends a thunder-bolt into his barns and burns them to the ground. If a lawyer makes out his brief on Sunday, he is sure to lose the case. Such and similar cases are registered by the thousand in the documents and tracts issued by the church. And to what end? To what other than to frighten the people into that observance of the day which she prescribes? Instead of a day of rest and recreation, a day for the recuperation of mind and body, she makes it into a day of bodily inactivity and mental stupor—a day of pain and tedium for children and of stupid devoutness for grown folks.

Our ecclesiastical friends never weary in their efforts to prevent what they call "the desecration of the Sabbath." They hold meetings, write memorials, get up petitions, without end. Of course, they always disclaim any attempt "to make men pious by compulsory measures"—they by no means wish, they say, "to compel men to do this or that on Sunday." All they ask is that there shall be complete cessation of all "secular" work and pleasure on that day. There shall be perfect liberty of conscience, but no "invasions of the civil Sabbath." But who does not see that this is, after all, only another way of saying: "You may think as you like, but you must do as we like, or, at any rate, you shall not do anything we do not like."

Now, even if we were all agreed as to the necessity of preventing "the desecration of the Sabbath," everything would turn on what we regarded as a desecration of the day. From one point of view I might, perhaps, be inclined to favor the object; but I should want to begin with the worst cases. Worse than all Sunday liquor-selling, worse than Sunday gambling or Sunday theatres, worse than the beer gardens and their "sacred concerts," worse than St. Patrick processions, worse than all these put together, more demoralizing and degrading, are—those open shops of the Devil, into which men, women, and children are enticed, and told that, if before a given time they do not come up and be converted, God will rain down fire and brimstone upon them. Therefore I should say, let us, in the name of humanity, begin here. Let us close all so-called revival meetings on Sunday at any rate, when men are most likely to fall into their snare,—let us close them, not because they are irreligious, although they are in the highest degree, but because they are a most flagrant offence against good morals and subversive of the welfare of the community.

With the Sabbath as such I have no quarrel—only with the Ecclesiastical Sabbath, which makes the true Sabbath impossible. I do not believe that a regularly returning day of absolute rest is necessary for all men—not even for all men who work with their hands the rest of the time. But I do believe that a regular and frequent day of recreation is necessary for all men. And by recreation I mean re-creation, not mere amusement, pastime, sport, although these are also necessary. Let there be no formalism and no prescription about it, but let each seek what he most needs, and give him the opportunity to find it, or, in other words, provide it for him. It is much more essential that a delicate girl who has been confined in a factory all the week, or a man who has been shut up in a foundry, should on Sunday find the door open into the temple of Nature than into what is so often misnamed the temple of God. Indeed, it may be laid down as a rule that every one ought to spend at least a portion of Sunday in communion with Nature. In what way he will do this should be left to himself. But at any rate, give those who are hived up in cities all the week long, the privilege of the country on Sundays. Provide them with means of conveyance and pleasant places of resort. Let every railroad run special trains on Sunday for the benefit of the poorer classes, at half price. Let the steamboats do the same. Give friends at a distance this opportunity of frequent personal intercourse. For those whose work is in the open air during the week, let our public libraries be open on Sunday, our reading rooms and museums. Let there be Sunday concerts in our public parks. Let us have public baths, which shall be open especially on Sundays. Let the young men who need bodily exercise and cannot get it during the week, spend at least a part of the Sunday in the open air. Let the theatres be open on Sunday evening for those who wish to go there. For these are also schools of virtue, when they are true to their ideal; and if false to it, they only fall under the same censure as many of our churches. Let free scope be given to every moral desire, on Sunday as well as on any other day of the week. Let us seek to sanctify all days, to celebrate, so far as that is concerned, as Justin Martyr said, a perpetual Sabbath. "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day," said Jesus; and it is not lawful to do evil on any day. The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath.

But what is to become of the church, of preaching, of the ministers? My friends, if there is need of them, and I think there is, they will only gain by the change; if there is no need of them, they will sooner or later "go to their own place." If you do not seek to drive men to church through fear, they may possibly begin to go out of love. Give them something worth going for, and they will be sure to go. Help them to cultivate whatever is manly and noble, whatever is human, and you cannot prevail upon them to stay away. But do not seek to monopolize their day of recreation, or to prescribe what they shall do on that day any more than on the rest. Do not set up the deception of a specially holy time, for even your dupes will in the end be undeceived—rather seek to make all time holy.

There is one duty, finally, which I think imperative upon us all—to seek to deprive the ecclesiastical Sabbath of its legal support. So long as the Sabbath is hedged about with pains and penalties, Church and State are in reality not separate. The Sabbath of the church is a hindrance to physical, moral, and intellectual development of the people, it is subversive of true religion, a stumbling block in the way of all progress whatsoever, and finally it is contrary to the fundamental law of the land and to the genius of our institutions—it ought to be abolished.

THE GERMAN FREE-THINKERS OF OUR CITY.

[From the Cincinnati Commoner.]

We have heard so much of German free-thinkers, that we expected a large participation from them in the late Free Religious Convention, but were disappointed. There were a few Israelitic Germans, but of the Germans generally there were but one or two, and these we need not name. A few might plead that, as the proceedings were conducted in English, they could not share in the discussion; but this excuse applies to very few of them. There is, in our opinion, cause of complaint in this absenteeism of our Teutonic fellow-citizens, and they should heed the complaint. They are not slow in letting Americans know that they regard them as behind the age in religious matters; but here were American gentlemen, and preachers at that, who had gone to Europe, and especially to German fountains of knowledge, and who came frankly forward and confessed that existing religious organizations were no longer satisfactory to them, and that they were desirous of a freer sphere for religious thought. They called upon all to attend, and to support or oppose this, their new movement. They invited Mr. Keemelin, a German by birth, to present his views, although they knew that he disagreed with them, and had publicly criticized them. They welcomed to their meeting both those who thought they did not go far enough, and also those who thought they went too far. Why were our German free-thinkers absent?

But, stranger still, the German press studiously ignored the Convention. No reporter was there from any of their papers. One editor of a German religious paper was present; he is also the pastor of a German church; but as we do not exchange with his journal, we do not know whether it broke the general silence of the German press or not.

The absence of our Germans from many other assemblies to which they would be warmly welcomed, is also noticeable. Why do they keep away from all great commercial meetings? Why are they also absent from all larger trade movements? They constitute one-third of our population, and fully one-fifth of our business men; yet not over five of our German fellow-citizens attend on public occasions, when the larger movements (in trade) are set in motion. Usually, they copy the proceedings from the English papers, but not always. We have had several large assemblages this summer in our city. At two of them—the Sängerfest and the Schuetzenfest—the Germans were the main element; but the Americans assisted in both. In the other bodies the Americans were the chief workers, and only one or two Germans co-operated. Is not this strange? The Americans help in German undertakings, but the Germans do not aid the Americans!

Are the Germans willing to have it understood that in the more important affairs of life the Americans are to take them in tow? Are they determined that in the new religious development of this country they will not assist that which they approve, nor oppose, though invited, what they disapprove? We put these queries in all kindness, but in the spirit of a warning; for we know that Germanism has no future in America, if it persists in its absenteeism from the more important affairs of this people. *

AMERICAN RELIGION.

[From the Indianapolis Daily Commercial.]

Rev. Rowland Connor, of Boston, Vice President of the American Free Religious Association, preached a sermon at the Academy of Music yesterday, announcing for his subject "The Religion of America," and taking for his text a quotation from the sayings of Jesus as rendered by St. John, fourth chapter and twenty-first verse,—"The hour cometh when ye shall neither at this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father." The speaker said that while the essential element of religion was common to all men, the manifestation of religion and modes of worship were as varied as the different races; that as the people of different climes and nationalities differed in their modes of dress and habits of life, so they differed in their conceptions and manifestations of the religious impulse; that when left to themselves, any people developes a religion adapted to them exactly; and when a foreign religion is imposed upon a people, they modify it greatly. The Jews had a religion that suited them, but the fact that they made but few converts proved that it was not adapted to the people about them. Their religion was eminently national, as was that of the Greeks and of the Chinese. He said that Christianity was very different in Spain, England, and Scotland. In the one it was a blind superstition; in the other a cold, stiff formalism, and in the latter a system of narrow dogmas.

He argued that history established the fact that every nation's religion was born with it, was as much native to the soil as was the people, and all efforts to engraft foreign religions on the native tree failed, or, at most, resulted in a sickly growth, bearing but little fruit.

This is precisely what has been attempted in America. Blindly ignoring the fact that with the birth of this nation there also was born a religion broader, grander, and purer than ever thrilled the hearts of a people before, the priests have attempted to bind her young energies to a religion made of the various dogmas of the Hebrews, the myths of the Jews and Pagans alike, and the ritualisms of Europe. There is not an essential feature in it that is American. It is wholly exotic and alien.

It begins by adopting as its God Jehovah, the narrow, vengeful, jealous God of the Jews, and ends by conforming to the architecture of continental Europe. Its holy mountain is Mount Zion, an insignificant hill, less than 300 feet high. Its holy city is Jerusalem, a contemptible dirty city of the East, which has narrow, cramped streets, and a population made up of about equal numbers of Mahometans, Jews and Christians. Its holy river is Jordan, a small, meandering stream of Palestine. It magnifies the land of Canaan, and bows in reverence before the patriots, prophets, and warriors of the little ancient province of Judæa.

It acknowledges not the God of America, which is none other than the God of humanity. It has no enthusiasm for Bunker Hill, the Mount Zion of America. It ignores the noble Hudson and the grand old Mississippi. It is silent of praise for New York or Boston, or any American city. It incontinently snubs Columbus and Americus, the Caleb and Joshua of America; and Washington, her Moses; and Jefferson, and Franklin, and Paine, her chief prophets. It is silent of praise for Whittier and Longfellow, and Key and Bryant, the psalmists of America. This foreign religion refuses to express itself in American architecture, but builds up houses that resemble the moss-grown cathedrals of the old world. It refuses to sing the songs of America, but instead lifts its voice in praise of men and acts and scenes of another and distant age and land. And with all this her priests complain that her altars are deserted, her services declined by the great mass of our people; and they call us irreligious infidels; whereas in rejecting this narrow foreign religion and clinging to our own religion, we prove ourselves Americans worthy the name.

American religion is a religion of truth and justice and humanity. Its God, the All Father. Its end, liberty, equality, fraternity. Its fruits—are they not all about us? Its outworkings are seen in our love for humanity, our pity for the oppressed, our charity for the poor, our institutions of learning, our halls of science, and workshops and factories; in our efforts to educate the ignorant, to free the enslaved, to lift up the down-trodden, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to reform the vicious.

Her sacraments demand bread enough for her hungry children, drink enough to slake their thirst, and water sufficient to keep them clean. In America the German, the Irishman, the Englishman, and the Spaniard become Americans at least in the second generation, and the coming church will also be American and become the home of the religion of America.

A naturalist wanted to take a monkey with him in a railway carriage from Southampton to London, but the guard of the train insisted that the monkey was a dog, and must go up in the dog van. The naturalist, in high irritation, took a tortoise out of his pocket and demanded if that too were a dog. Whereupon the guard, like a true Briton, slowly, but firmly, replied,—"No, sir; them's all right; them be hinsex."

REFLECTIONS ON THE CONVENTIONS.

A few thoughts occur to us, in addition to what has been reported in previous numbers, concerning our Western Conventions. This being the first experiment in public meetings which the Free Religious Association has attempted beyond its annual meeting in Boston, the result has been awaited with a good deal of interest. It has been charged that the Association is a New England clique—a speculative “notion” at home only in Boston. This charge has come, of course, from those not friendly to the Association. Some, however, of its friends have been apprehensive lest the success of such Conventions as we have just held in the West would hardly justify the experiment. Our principal speakers, it was feared, while ripe scholars and good essayists, did not have sufficient readiness in address to meet the popular demand made upon the platform of a Western Convention. And then, too, our objects, and even the existence of the Association, were comparatively little known, and we had no extensive means, no machinery, for advertising our meetings,—having to rely mainly on notices in the public secular press, which might never be seen even by half the people who would be interested. Considering these things, not a few among us who had full faith in the public demand for such Conventions and in their ultimate success, could hardly help feeling a little uncertain as to the result of this first attempt. Others were more confident, and believed that, notwithstanding the unfavorable conditions necessarily attending a first experiment, we could hardly go amiss of success anywhere.

And the first thing we wish to say in this summary of reflections, is that this faith of the more confident proved to be better founded than the apprehensions of the doubtful. Every one of the three Conventions was successful in accomplishing its objects. Our expectations at each place visited, though falling short, perhaps, in one or two particulars, were in the aggregate fully realized. And the whole series of meetings together has done more to make the cause of the Association known, and to prepare the way for its future activity, than any one thing which it has done during the three and a half years of its existence.

But some critic says, “the attendance was small;” and an anxious amateur reporter at Cincinnati took pains to telegraph to an evangelical paper in Boston that the Convention in that city was little known and excited no attention. The fact that he took the trouble to send the dispatch may be taken as some evidence to disprove its contents. But a better evidence that the Convention was thought to have some public importance consists in the fact that the daily papers of Cincinnati gave two columns or more to reporting its proceedings each day. The journals of Indianapolis and Toledo were equally respectful and generous. As to the attendance, it was estimated that at the opening session at Cincinnati, in the Hebrew Temple, there were more than a thousand people present. On the second evening the main hall of Mr. Vickers’ church (we know not how many its seats) was full. At the evening sessions of both the other Conventions the attendance was large. The day sessions, it is true, were not numerously attended at any of the Conventions. In the busy cities of the West, it was hardly to be expected that people would gather in great numbers at a religious convention in the busy hours of a week-day. We venture to say, however, that no Ecclesiastical Convention, not carrying its audience with it from different parts of the country, but trusting to local attendance, would have had larger meetings during the day than did these Conventions of the Free Religious Association. And though not large, the quality of the audience at every session was such that no one of the speakers felt it to be a waste of time or labor to hold the meeting. It was the live, thinking people who were present,—men and women of ideas, and experience, and influence. The large attendance of men was especially noted. And some of the most constant and interested attendants were Evangelical Ministers and Catholic Priests. So far as the opportunity for a hearing is concerned, the projectors of the Conventions are entirely satisfied with their success.

And, secondly, the result of the experiment satisfied the Committee of the wisdom of the project, and will doubtless lead to its permanent adoption as one of the most efficient methods by which the Association may accomplish its aims. It is evident that there are thousands of people scattered through the country (and not very thinly), and that they are especially numerous in the West, who think and feel profoundly on religious subjects, who have keen consciences and pure aspirations, who yet for one reason and another have been thrown out of all relations of sympathy with every form of organized religion around them, and whom not even the most liberal sect of Christendom can draw to its faith and fellowship. One of the practical business men of Indianapolis read a paper at the Convention in that city, in which he said that society in the State of Indiana was honey-combed with radical religious ideas, and yet, excepting the Spiritualists (who by no means meet the whole radical want), there were but two or three liberal religious organizations in the whole State. Another Western man, well acquainted as a lecturer with large sections of the country, assured us that we might find hundreds of places, and some of them in much smaller towns and in sparsely settled farming districts, where we could easily gather larger Conventions than in the cities we had visited. The field was ripe, he said, for just the kind of work we had attempted. The liberal sentiment only needed to be appealed to, and it would manifest itself and disclose its power. We all felt the truth of this assurance as the Conventions proceeded. Our speakers became so interested in the work, that, laborious and wearing as it was, they were reluctant to quit the field; and had it not been for the waiting posts of home duty, we believe they would have eagerly organized themselves into a volunteer squadron for a year’s campaign. They were very sure that they should want, at least, to re-enlist for the work next year.

Another noticeable point was that our apprehensions proved totally groundless as to the ability of our speakers to meet the demands of the Western platform. Standing face to face with a thinking audience eager to hear the ideas we had to offer, seemed to develop a power of easy and attractive extemporaneous utterance which the speakers could hardly believe themselves to possess. So that, though one or two of the speakers upon whose ability in extemporaneous discussion we had most relied, were compelled to disappoint us, the interest of the meetings never for a moment flagged.

Finally, we were convinced that the West, like the East, wants living ideas uttered by live and earnest men; and wants them uttered in the most vigorous way. The only difference between the East and the West appears to be, that the West has not yet got so deep as the East into the ruts of routine and organization. In the West all the elements of society are yet free, and more malleable and plastic. And therefore it is that we expect the Free Religious Association, though having its headquarters in Boston, will find a most hospitable welcome, and achieve, perhaps, its greatest results in the West.

A LETTER FROM HON. R. D. OWEN.

We are glad to be allowed to print the following letter, though it was not written with a view to publication. Mr. Owen has been an interested member of the Free Religious Association, and one of its Vice Presidents, since it was first organized. His distant residence, however, for the most of the time has prevented his attendance of meetings.

NEW HARMONY, IND., Sept. 20, 1870.

MY DEAR SIR:—I received two days since your notice of meeting of Executive Committee; also, previously, a notice of the May meeting and the pamphlet containing proceedings, which I read with much interest and pleasure.

I am truly sorry that my remote residence and the preparation of a work that engrosses me have made me so profitless a member. Yet I hope that the work, when it appears, will be some atonement. It is to be entitled,—“The Debatable Land between This World and the Next,” relating chiefly, of course, to the evidence for spiritual phenomena. But about a quarter of the volume will be occupied by an Address to the Protestant Clergy on the present attitude of the Religious World. It is historical in character, showing that orthodox Protestantism, after making marvellous progress in the first half century (1520 to 1570), has lost ground for the last three hundred years, and is losing it still. I seek to show, however, that it is not the Christianity of the Gospels that has been thus losing the battle, but only an Augustinian commentary on some of the scholasticisms of St. Paul. I seek to show, also, that the signs and wonders and spiritual gifts of the New Testament were natural phenomena, occurring under intermundane laws, which prevail and produce similar results to-day; and therefore as credible as any other class of historical incidents.

A pretty wide field, you will admit: it seems to me a productive one.

I hope to get out my book not later than September of next year. It involves much labor, and has to be very carefully managed. I intend to condense it into a volume not larger than “Footfalls on the Boundary of the Next World,” which you have probably seen. I hope to give Spiritualism its proper niche among the branches of progressive knowledge.

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT DALE OWEN.

To Rev. Wm. J. POTTER.

In a later letter Mr. Owen expressed his regret that important business in Court would keep him from the Western Conventions, which he believed, from his knowledge of the West, would meet with a most cordial welcome, and be crowned with success.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,

And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, with respect,

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

Yours, with respect,

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES M. WOOD.

Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

WILL THE COMING MAN ATTEND CHURCH?

[An essay by Miss Elizabeth Peckham, read at the Toledo Convention of the Free Religious Association.]

The question whether the coming man will go to church is the question of the perpetuity of the church as an institution. I will say frankly at the outset—I do not think the coming man will go to church, unless it be one so changed as scarcely to deserve the name. The church, like all institutions, is built upon an idea, that central idea being to prepare men for another world. Death is, so to speak, the great fact of life. This fact, so insoluble, so mysterious, the primitive man had to face. It eluded his senses, it took possession of his imagination, it awed his whole soul. Here was something which was inevitable and inscrutable. No ordinary method would avail to explain it, no human soul could hope to escape it. This universal fact of human life has been made the basis of religion, and the motive that should hold men to it. Priests have always used it as a weapon to frighten those whom the helpless credulity of ignorance placed in the power of the unscrupulous. Alger tells us an incident which illustrates the manner in which these superstitious fears can be used. The unhappy Africans who were snatched from their homes, enslaved and cruelly tasked in the West India Islands, pined under their fate with deadly homesickness. The intense longing moulded their belief, as the sensation from some hot bricks at the feet of a sleeping man shaped his dreams into a journey up the sides of Mount Etna. They fancied that if they died they should immediately live again in their fatherland. They committed suicide in great numbers. At last, when other means had failed to check this epidemic of self-destruction, a cunning overseer brought them ropes and every facility for hanging, and told them to hang themselves as fast as they pleased, for their master had bought a great plantation in Africa, and as soon as they got there they would be set to work on it. Their credulous minds believed, and no more suicides occurred.

The Christian religion is based pre-eminently on a future world. The declaration of the Bible that "Christ has brought immortality to light," is not meant figuratively, but in a strictly literal sense. The theory that Christ saved mankind by bearing our sins upon the cross, by mediating between us and an offended God, or by leaving us an example of how men should live, these are all modern ideas utterly foreign to the primary understanding. Christ was believed to have saved men by going down into Sheol, the under world of spirits, where the "naked shades of men had their home," and bringing them the message that the power of death was broken. All who had ever lived and died had gone into this mysterious under-world. There they were all quietly waiting for the Great Deliverer. "Why," said Samuel, when called up and interrogated by the Witch of Endor, "why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up?" In that grand poem of Isaiah's the dead are represented as rising from their shadowy thrones to greet the incoming dead, saying, "Art thou also become weak as we?" "Art thou become like unto us!" Some such idea as Homer gives in his Iliad of the shades in Hades, such as the Catholics still preserve in the place consigned to unbaptized children, a phantom world, empty of hope or fear or joy or pain. Into this land of mists where Adam's sin had brought all the children of men, Christ went down to the "spirits in prison" and brought them tidings that another life was before them, and coming up again was seen by his disciples as a visible token that death's chains were broken; that they who had died should live again, he himself being the "first fruits of them that slept." "He is the beginning, the first born from among the dead," says the Bible. And in the primitive church the disciples lived in daily expectation of his immediate return, believing that they should not taste death till they had seen Christ come in the clouds with power to reward his believers. Is it an instinct of the value of the soul, or only a passionate craving for immortality, that has made religions so often put death as the result of sin and evildoing on man's part, and not in the original plan of creation? At any rate, Christianity may be said to be a system of preparation for the next life, a salvation compared to which all the other affairs of life are as dust in the balance. The great question it puts to believers is, "Are you prepared to die?"

When science discovered and revealed to men that death was a part of the original plan, and not the result of sin, a great revolution was begun. As the geologist reads in the different strata of the earth, upheaved by volcanoes and earthquakes, as he reads the record of a hundred races of animals which lived and died ages before the inception of man, he finds that death was monarch long before man began to be. The little garden of Eden, where, according to the Bible, the stupendous drama was played which settled man's destiny, bringing death into the world, sinks into nothingness in the sweep and circle of great laws which evolved man and determine his fate. After that we no longer go to church to be instructed as to our destiny, and the plan of salvation. We take no further interest in the great warfare waged between God and the devil for the souls of men, as the Emperor Julian said, "God and the devil have entered into a covenant that what is born the devil shall have, and what is baptized God shall have." Men kneel to-day in the temple of science and ask what light that throws on the problem of life. They look anxiously to the development theory to know what word or message that has for men. Darwin to-day is the prophet of the race, and beside him Moses sinks into obscurity. The church has had its whole foundation undermined. "As through Adam all died," the ministers keep saying, "so in Christ shall all be made alive." But science has knocked your premise to pieces, and pays the least possible attention to your conclusions. Do you ask if the coming man will go to church? The present man does not. Mr. Towne told us in Indianapolis that only about one man in forty goes to church, and he, generally, because his wife wants him to, and he thinks it respectable. In Berlin statistics show only three per cent. of the men go to church. In fact most men consider religion a pleasant feminine sentiment, becoming and graceful, and they let the women indulge themselves in it, while they go about the serious business of life.

It is evident to me that if the church be perpetuated, then this whole idea of religion as a preparation for the next world must be eliminated. It will have to place itself squarely upon this life if it is to live, it cannot poise itself in mid-air any longer. It will accept unflinchingly the fact that we know nothing about the future. No soul has come back to give us any tidings. The veil which God himself has drawn, we cannot lift. In place of dreams and fancies of the next life, it will be founded on the fact of this; and when we have a fact to build upon, we have gone down to the foundations of the universe and taken its pillars for our cornerstone. Not that the coming church will not dream of another life and hope for it, but it will not call its dreams, facts, nor build theories on them. In the grand words of Epictetus: "When death overtakes me, it is enough if I can stretch out my hands to God and say, The opportunities which thou hast given me of comprehending and following thy government, I have not neglected. I thank thee that thou hast brought me into being. I am satisfied with the time I have enjoyed the things thou hast given me. Receive them again and assign them to whatever place thou wilt." It will not solve the problem of the universe every Sunday, but very reverently and humbly it will seek the truth. The coming man will be a rationalist, and the corner-stone of his church must be science, from which must come its methods and its tools. So I say he will not go to church unless it be so changed as scarcely to be recognizable.

Of course, if this life is only a preparation for the next, it is comparatively unimportant. The church has been logical in its ascetic and celibate tendencies; it has been kind in its persecutions. And religion, occupied with the affairs of the next world, cannot take cognizance of this. Let the world marry and be given in marriage; and let the dead bury their dead, but its province is the future concerns of men. And if any discomfort or suffering in this life, if any persecution of the mortal body will save men from heresies unfitting them for a heaven in that future life to which alone all thoughts should be directed, cruel indeed would he be who for any agony to his victims, or sympathetic pangs to himself, should hesitate to apply the thumbscrew or the rack. Let the whole world moulder in ignorance, rot and fester in want and pain, religion must build churches to save these souls from perishing. Of what avail is all else? The world we see will soon be dust and ashes. With the conditions of men here, the church founded on this idea has logically nothing to do, and may absolve itself from all accusation save that of accepting a theory which results in inhumanity, and culminates in persecution. The pages of history are splashed with blood shed in its name, and the cry of outraged humanity was unheeded and forgotten. It co-existed and does still with civil despotisms which grind men under their iron heels, till in modern France, the people confounding religion and tyranny, swept both aside in the breath of its terrible anger. It has troubled itself so little with the great human interests of men that in the most thoughtful minds, religion has often become another name for superstitious hallucinations used to enslave the minds of the people, without regard to their real needs. The grandest men in history have been infidels to this religion because faithful to humanity.

One of our number spoke in Indianapolis of the humanity of the Romish Church. If this be so, I honor that church; no prejudice against it I think lurks in my mind; but I have failed to see its humanity. I know of no church which has carried out with stricter logical consistency the results of the theory I spoke of. Grand as individuals among them have been, yet the aim of the church and the work of the church has been to prepare men for the next world by prayers and confessions, masses and indulgences. But how have they striven to educate them, to put the tools in their hands for mental and physical independence? In France, not more than a year since, the Catholic clergy set their faces against a movement to secure a better education to their girls. Roman Catholic countries are noted for their ignorance and their poverty, as every nation must be which is true to this theory, which, in its anxiety to escape from a future hell, has been quite successful in making a hell of this world.

But the coming church, starting with a different idea, logically reaches a different conclusion. Its work is in and for this world. It will be far more anxious to build school houses than churches; anxious to help men to the surroundings which shall develop and fit them for this world. A free government and equality before the laws, opportunities for education, channels to work through, means of self-support. There is a restless philanthropy and charity, the specialty of our time, which show the workings of this spirit. Stewart's magnificent building to provide homes for working women, is one of its outcomes. Woman suffrage, free Trade, labor reform, anti-slavery parties, are all based on a religion which believes in this world, recognizes the importance of this life, and would have been wholly impossible under the sway of a religion whose whole tendency was to ignore them, save as despised means to a better end. The spinning jenny, the printing press, the sewing machine, the telegraph, the steamboat, the steam engine, are its practical results. And these have done more to teach human fellowship than all the precepts of the Bible; these have been a practical philanthropy emancipating men from unceasing toil, and guaranteeing the leisure which is the first condition of culture. The old Saxon king, who gave a large part of his treasury for the tooth of Saint Cuthbert, when an enemy threatened the country and his fleet needed to be repaired; the crusaders of the middle ages, who gave blood and treasure and life to recover the tomb of Jesus from Turks and infidels, were loyal to their idea. We, too, have our crusaders and our chivalry, but they fight in the name of humanity, not Jesus, to make the living homes of men more pure, more noble, more divine. Now you all know that a Christian's home is in heaven, wherever that may be, and logically his whole mind should be devoted to getting himself and his fellow-men there; nevertheless, many a Christian works outside this line without recognizing the spirit which directs him. The sweep of modern ideas is mighty, it carries us along in spite of ourselves, and because swayed more by this spirit than your own theories, you are with and of us. In so far as you work for these interests, you confess yourselves of the communion of free religion. For although not one stone is placed upon another in the church of the coming man, yet the spirit of its worship is abroad in the world.

Our Catholic Christianity, whose dogmas gave rise to a tradition of a spectral pack of hellhounds composed of the souls of unbaptized children who could not rest, but roamed and howled through the woods all night, our Protestant Christianity, which declared that hell was paved with the skulls of infants not a span long, any church which finds room for a permanent everlasting hell within the universe, may well learn from this Oriental apologue. God once sat on his inconceivable throne, where rank after rank of angels and arch-angels, cherubim and seraphim, gleamed and shone around him. The anthem of their praises shook the pillars of creation, when, as they closed their hymn, stole up from some far distance, in dim accents, a responsive amen. God asked Gabriel, "whence comes that amen?" He said, "it comes from the damned in hell." God took from where it hung above his seat, the key that unlocks the forty thousand doors of hell, and giving it to Gabriel bade him go release them. And on wings of light he flew, and rescuing the millions of the lost, brought them to heaven in their robes of dirt and want. Henceforth, the fablesays, there are none so dear to God as those thus saved.

The creed we shall most warmly cherish is of faith in man. That no soul has fallen so far from love and God, that in his heart of hearts goodness finds no amen. In the slums of our cities, and their back alleys, where little children are trained in vice and graduate in crime; in our gambling houses and dens of prostitution, where men and women desecrate the very sacraments of love; where womanhood is most degraded, where manhood is most debased, yes, from the very hells your churches tell of, far outside of man's pity and help, some faint amen will reach the ears of God and empty hell itself. Radbod, one of the old Scandinavian kings, who was persuaded to be baptized by the Christian missionaries, with one foot in the water, asked the priests if he should meet his forefathers in heaven. Learning from them that they, being unbaptized pagans, were doomed to endless misery, he refused to be baptized, preferring to be in hell with his ancestors. The grand old Norse hero was true to the instincts of our common humanity, so often outraged by your superstitions, true to that human love, the only way by which we have ever learned of God, reaching up from the human love to the divine. The spirit of the coming church, holding all men as kindred, would rather sink to any hell within the universe, to any hell in any of God's worlds, than reach a heaven which any human soul should seek and could not find.

When of old the angels came to the shepherds, they proclaimed "Glory to God, and on earth peace, good will to man." Only half of that message has been practically recognized as a part of religion, and that dimly. Good will to men, not in its narrow and meagre form of Christian fellowship, but in human brotherhood, recognizing and valuing men because they are men, and making that a basis of union. The church has no idea of this truth. It is broken up into a hundred different sects, whose animosities and squabbles Mr. Frothingham described last night. The ideal man is harmonious, and would avoid such churches as a debasing and demoralizing influence. The tendency of civilization is towards aggregation. If co-operation is the test of civilization, it is also its condition. The wandering tribes, whose only communication has been in battle, find other terms of intercourse, and gradually merge in a nation. As the tide of civilization advances, this tendency becomes more pronounced. Italy has just become unified by the sending away of the Papal troops. Germany is longing intensely for German unity, as the basis of German freedom. Our country, which represents more fully the modern idea, instinctively recognizing union as the modern method, refused to allow secession at any price. This tendency in the political world must show itself in the religious, for the world is a unit and its tendencies converge. Civilized religions will outgrow this guerilla warfare and turn their guns on vice and sin. Without losing individuality or diversity, they will grow together, because opinions and faiths will no longer be the ground of union, or disunion. Railroads have brought men closer together and annihilated the partitions of space which formerly walled them in from each other. Ribs of steel hold the East to the West; magnetic nerves, wave-washed, thrill from shore to shore; and, "as in water, face answers to face, so the heart of man to man." On this continent the peoples brought together, face to face, will make that comparison of creeds and nationalities which must result in the enriching of each, the broadening of all. In the ideal church, each religion dropping its special pretensions and traditions, will give its best and broadest thought to humanity, which alone can claim and is master of them all; and Christianity will give place to a religion, free, because chained to no special form, but voicing itself in all.

These are but a few of the points wherein the coming church will differ from the present; but time fails me to develop the subject more fully. In short, then, the church as based on dogmas and creeds, will be useless in the future, and is rapidly crumling now. But a church which is an expression of the instinct of worship, which making no vain pretensions to revelation save through reason, is a loyal pupil of science, which recognizes the value of ideas, strives to make plain the worth of manhood, and create the enthusiasm of liberty; such a church will find worshippers so long as men need to learn, or seek to worship.

There is a mode of organization which I hope will supplement the coming church. I allude to Radical Clubs. To organize a Club nothing is needed but that intelligent men and women should come together to consider radical ideas and their application to practical questions. It requires some courage to come forward in these Clubs, since society now brings to bear an enormous pressure to induce men not to express their convictions on these subjects. The church has not only blinded men intellectually, but it has debased them morally, by bringing its whole organized strength, powerful because organized, to enforce silence, if it cannot induce belief. In all of our churches the pews are filled with those whom you call infidels, and I call believers. You ministers ask your vestry and congregation, and you congregations ask your ministers, for these doubts often lie hidden in your very pulpit. Timidly and alone men entertain or dismiss the fears and doubts and hopes which should be brought to the light. I want radicals to organize and co-operate, not on the plane of special creeds, but on the basis of liberty and unity in diversity. In this I do not ignore the superior weight which must attach to the opinions of those who make any question their special study. We want the pulpit to prepare thought for the people; but the other agency is none the less needed as a supplement. It is said to take a man's weight in lead to kill him, and I am sure it often takes more than his weight in sermons to reach him. But in this republican plan, each can express his special word or question. I think, too, they are a very good place for ministers, who stand in quite too impregnable a position in their pulpits. The lawyer who wished he had been a minister because in his pulpit there is none to oppose him, was not far wrong. If ministers had an opposing attorney like lawyers, I think they would not so long continue to preach an outworn and outgrown creed. Luther, indeed, had an opponent in the person of the devil, who came to him in bodily shape, tormenting him with doubts and fears and questions, and the mark on the wall made by the inkstand he threw at him, is still shown to strangers. Long since he has grown chancier of his presence, and does not show himself with horns and hoofs. Religion is now handed down, as it were, from pulpit to pews, and perhaps this method might help to bring it home to us that not Christ's religion, however pure, could save or help a man; he must live and die by his own.

And it is worthy of note that Jesus, perhaps the most religious soul of his time, found his opportunity in a kind of Radical Club of the day. While the high priest only officiated at the temple in Jerusalem, in the synagogues any one could speak to the people; and here the young Galilean brought to the poor and humble the vital religion, which, born in his heart, appealed to theirs. Little they dreamed, those priests, in the pride of power carrying on their rites and ceremonies, of the more spiritual faith growing up, which must some day take their place; as little as the ministers of yonder churches dream that a larger spirit is abroad in the world, which finds its worship in every uplifting and joyful instinct, its sacraments in every table where affection breaks the bread.

In conclusion I would say the conditions of the coming church are freedom and culture, its methods are those of science, its work that of philanthropy, its aim the truth; but the spirit that informs it all is religion, kindled by love and uplifted by faith. The old terrible inscription over Dante's hell rings through all our religions—"Leave all hope behind, ye who enter here." Taking the whole earth for a church, the future religion says to all children of men, "Leave all fear behind, ye who enter here. For at the centre of the universe beneficence sits throned and crowned. Call it law, or call it God, you can not get beyond the reach of its strong arms."

A HERO.

Carlyle, in his life of John Sterling, tells of two miners in South Caradon, Cornwall, England, at the bottom of a shaft with a blast prepared. Both could not be hauled up together by the only man above. The last one was to be taken up after igniting the fuse. One thought the fuse too long, and pounded off a piece between two stones. In so doing he ignited the fuse. Instead of pulling it out, both men sprang for the basket, and gave the signal for hoisting. But the load could not be raised an inch. Then Michael Warren left the basket, sat on the ground, and said, "Go aloft, Roberts, in one minute I shall be in heaven." Roberts, in ascending, looked downwards, and was wounded in the face by the blast. As soon as he was safe at the top, others went down for the remains of poor Warren. They found him alive and little injured, buried under rocks that had arched themselves over him. L. Simoni informs us that thenceforth he was a changed man. A few hearty admirers sent him to school. He became a farmer, married a school-mistress, and led a prosperous life.

I hate anything that occupies more space than it is worth. I hate to see a load of bandboxes go along the street, and I hate to see a parcel of big words without anything in them.—Hazlitt.

CIRCULARS OF THE RADICAL MONTHLY.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND FRIENDS.

I suspended the publication of "The Radical" last July, my plan being to resume again next January. Only one thing would prevent my doing so,—a failure to secure for the work in the intervening months a satisfactory pecuniary basis. Several considerations impelled me to postpone an active effort until Fall.

If the Magazine be started anew with a capital sufficiently large to enable me to work with advantage, much can be accomplished hitherto impossible. I am aware that I have no claim personally upon any one, and should make no public appeal whatever, but that I have some reason to suppose the continuance of "The Radical" is a matter in which others are as much interested as myself. Believing this, I put the case without further apology, as briefly as possible.

My judgment is that the re-establishment of the Magazine on a durable basis cannot properly be undertaken with a capital much less than TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS. To some unexperienced in the business of such an enterprise, this sum may seem unreasonably large. But if they will consult those acquainted with the private history of other like undertakings, they will concede their mistake. But for advantages of position and character the work has already secured, the estimate would need to be increased.

In asking contributions to this fund, I will hold myself pledged to a faithful endeavor to use the amounts received for the re-establishment and continuance of the Magazine. If my past efforts have any merit in warranting confidence, the fact, announced in this way, will be gratefully appreciated.

In order promptly to issue a number for January, it is necessary to complete the canvass for means without delay. This circular is sent to all subscribers, and to others who are reported as likely to be interested. I hope each one who receives a copy will feel that my appeal is intended to be personal. Let me ask of every one approving the object the favor of a serious and practical effort. No sum need be thought too small—or too large. The good-will of all will be equally recognized.

I wish now only pledges, to be redeemed on the 1st of December next, or as soon thereafter as I am able to certify that the amount required has been subscribed.

Each contributor will then receive a list of the amounts and names of the donors.

With this Circular is supplied a form of subscription, which will be convenient for use.

S. H. MORSE.

PROSPECTUS.

The following outline of a Prospectus is sent to be used in obtaining new subscribers, the price of subscription to be remitted on receipt of the first number. This is a part of the programme of much importance. Let our list be largely increased at once, and the surety of success will be to that extent augmented. Let each working friend get as large an amount as he or she can for the Fund, and send all the names of new subscribers it is possible to obtain. We hope also that old subscribers whose terms have expired, and who desire to renew, will forward their names. All who renew their subscriptions, and all new subscriptions taken before the 1st of January next, will be received at $3 00 each.

It will be understood, of course, that this Prospectus is conditional, anticipating a successful issue of our effort.

THE RADICAL MONTHLY

The publication of THE RADICAL MONTHLY will be resumed on the 1st of January, 1871.

In the interval of six months since the Magazine was suspended, the proprietor has been able to secure a permanent pecuniary basis for the work. He now has the pleasure of announcing not only the continuance of the Monthly, but his ability to increase its value as a medium of free, rational thought applied to religious, social, scientific, and other questions.

The list of Contributors whose services "The Radical Monthly" can command is equal to the best at home or abroad.

"The Radical Monthly" will comprise Essays; Historical and Biographical Sketches; Poetry; Stories, original and translated; Translations from French and German writers by C. C. Shackford; Records of Scientific interest by a writer of known ability, whose name is for the present reserved; Reviews of Foreign Literature, by Thomas Vickers; Letters on European affairs, by M. D. Conway; Reports of the "Radical Club" of Boston, and similar associations in other parts of the country; Notes by the Editor; and Reviews and Notices of Current Literature.

It will be the aim of the work to supply the public with a Monthly Magazine of Thought, Information, and Entertainment, presenting the radical culture of the country at its best.

A WORD FURTHER.

Since the accompanying Circular was in print, I have been led to add a word further in regard to the amount I have specified as necessary to put "The Radical" on a proper basis.

In order to make the Magazine what it should be, I desire to be able to pay contributors for their work.

This is absolutely necessary to secure "The Radical" the place it ought to occupy in American literature. It is also just to writers, very few of whom are able, however well disposed, to give their labor away.

I must also be able to advertise the Magazine so the public may know that such a periodical is in existence. Heretofore not one in fifty of even the radical public has been made aware of the fact.

These demands must be met, if "The Radical" is ever to reach a position where it can be permanently maintained.

I may freely say that in the few years past I have had all the experience I need in trying to do something with nothing. If now I gain an opportunity to work under more encouraging circumstances, I shall be very glad to continue. If not, I would rather the matter should end where it is. S. H. M.

AN ATHEIST IN COURT.

[From the Boston Investigator.]

MR. EDITOR:—Last month a case came up before the Circuit Court, at Pontiac, the county seat of Livingston Co., Illinois, in which a judicial decision was made by Judge Wood which deserves notice, since it is an indication of the progress Liberalism is making in these Western States.

The case was one of R. B. Amsbury against Wm. Pulliam. The counsel for the latter objected to Mr. Amsbury as an incompetent witness, on the ground that he was an Atheist. "That man," said he, "does not believe in a God. He has no more idea of Deity than a snake or a rat. I object to the testimony of such a man."

The matter being thus referred to the Judge, the counsel for Pulliam was told that it was his privilege to question Mr. Amsbury respecting the opinion which he thought disqualified him as a witness. The questions and answers were substantially as follows:—

Counsel—"You don't believe in a God, a Creator, Christ, or Savior?"

Mr. Amsbury—"I object to a man of your small intellectual calibre framing propositions of belief for me."

Counsel—"Well, then, I ask, Do you believe in a God?"

Mr. Amsbury—"If you will define your God—for there are many conceptions, the Mohammedan, Hindu, Christian, &c.,—I will tell you whether or not I believe in him."

Counsel—"Do you believe in the Christian God?"

Mr. Amsbury—"No, sir. Such a conception is too narrow for my mind. I believe in the eternity of matter, and the co-eternity of its laws. I believe in no individual, personal God, but recognize Nature herself as self-existent, and in eternal operation under unchangeable, irrevocable laws. I give to matter all the sublimest attributes which the Christian gives to a personal Deity."

Counsel—"Do you believe in future rewards and punishments?"

Mr. Amsbury—"No sir."

Counsel—"Do you believe in the immortality of the soul?"

Mr. Amsbury—"No, Sir. There are certain theories, I am aware, which are appealed to in support of this doctrine; but then there are facts which in my mind lead to the contrary conclusion."

The competency of Mr. Amsbury as a witness being referred to the Judge, he decided that under the Bill of Rights in the New Constitution, adopted May 13, 1870, belief in a Deity and in the immortality of the soul was not necessary as a qualification for a witness in a court of law, and in this respect nothing further could be required than that the witness should believe an oath was binding on his conscience.

Mr. Amsbury was then asked if he would regard an oath binding on his conscience? He replied affirmatively. Whereupon the oath was administered, and the court proceeded with its business.

Mr. Amsbury is one of the leading business men of Fairbury, and has done business in the county to the amount of more than five millions of dollars. He is a man of irreproachable private character, and is much esteemed in the community for his many fine personal qualities. In all the business he has done, this is the first case he has had in a court of law.

The defendant in the suit is, I am informed, a man of quite different character and antecedents, but he is a Christian, and it seems he was ready to take advantage of Mr. Amsbury's unpopular views and make them the cause of legal disqualification in order to destroy the force of his honest statements relating to an ordinary business transaction, when he knew there was no Christian in the county more upright or honorable or more widely respected than our friend Mr. Amsbury.

Judge Wood lives at Ornago Co., Ill., and is in religious belief a Swedenborgian. He is evidently a liberal-minded man, and could no doubt give some valuable advice to such gentlemen of the bench as Judge Sharswood of Philadelphia.

In this connection I desire to add Sec. 3 of the Bill of Rights in the New Constitution of Illinois:—

"The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination, shall forever be guaranteed; and no person shall be denied any civil or political right, or privilege, or capacity, on account of his religious opinions; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be construed to dispense with oaths or affirmations, excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the State. No person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship, against his consent, nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or worship."

Respectfully,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

CARLYLE'S FAMOUS LETTER.

The following letter from Thomas Carlyle was elicited by the receipt of a poem entitled "The Temple of Isis," by William Denovan:—

CHELSEA (LONDON), 19th January, 1869.

DEAR SIR: At last I received your pamphlet, and have read it with what attention and appreciation I could bestow. Considerable faculties of mind are manifested in it; powers of intellect, of imagination; a serious, earnest character; here and there a tone of sombre eloquence, and vestiges of real literary skill. But my constant regret was, and is, to see such powers operating in a field palpably chaotic, and lying beyond the limits of man's intelligence! These are not thoughts which you give; they are huge, gaunt, vacant dreams—forever incapable, by nature, of being either affirmed or denied.

My clear advice, therefore, would be, give up all that; refuse to employ your intellect on things where no intellect can avail; to sow good seed on realms of mere cloud and shadow! The highest intellect which issues in no certainty has completely failed. The world of practice and fact is the true arena for its inhabitants; wide enough for any or for all intellects of men; and never lay more encumbered with sordid darkness and pernicious delusions than even now. Real intellect might write with advantage on such things—better still, perhaps, it might remain silent, and bend its whole force on illuminating one's own poor path in such a wilderness; on more and more clearly ascertaining, for at least one earnest man, what to do, and how to do it!

Probably you will not adopt this advice, almost certainly not at once; nor shall that disaffect me at all. Your tract I found throughout to be rather pleasant reading, and to have a certain interest; nothing in it, except one small section, treating of a thing I never mention, unless when compelled—the thing which calls itself "Spiritualism," (which might more fitly be called "Ultra-brutalism," and "Liturgy of Dead Sea Apes")—was disagreeable to me.

Yours, with many good wishes,

T. CARLYLE.

STOPPING NEWSPAPERS.

"You have an undoubted right to stop your newspaper whenever you are disposed, upon payment of all arrearsages. Do not hesitate to do so on account of any 'tenderness of feeling' for the editor. Don't you suppose he would stop buying sugar of you, or meat, clothing, dry goods, etc., if he thought he was not getting his money's worth? And when you discontinue a paper, do so manfully. Don't be so pitiful as to throw it back to the postmaster with a contemptuous 'I don't want it any longer!' and have 'refused' written on the margin and have the paper returned to the editor. No gentleman ever stopped a paper in that way, no matter if his head was covered with gray hairs that should be honorable. If you do not wish longer to receive a newspaper, write a note to the editor, like a man, saying so—and be sure that arrearsages are paid. This is the way to stop a newspaper."—Exchange.

SOCRATIC.—The celebrated 'Abou Yusuph, who was Judge of Bagdad in the reign of the Caliph Hadee, was a very remarkable instance of that humility which distinguishes true wisdom. His sense of his own deficiencies often led him to entertain doubts, where men of less knowledge and more presumption were decided. It is related of this Judge that, on one occasion, after a very patient investigation of facts, he declared that his knowledge was not competent to decide upon the case before him. "Pray, do you expect," said a pert courtier who heard this declaration, "that the Caliph is to pay your ignorance?" "I do not," was the mild reply; "the Caliph pays me, and pays well, for what I do know; if he were to attempt to pay me for what I do not know, the treasures of his empire would not suffice."—Malcolm's Persia.

MUCH IN LITTLE.—A little Irish girl, about six years old, living in Massachusetts, was lately telling some of her school-mates—children of Protestant parents—what great things the priest could do. "Why," said she, "if he wished, he could turn a man to stone!" The other children laughed, and said, "we don't believe it." "Well," was her reply—beautiful for its simplicity—"if I was you I wouldn't believe it, but I've got to."

PROBLEM.—R. H. Ober, of Boston, is surprised, so he writes, at two things connected with capital punishment. One is, that so many should be hung after they are converted and have become Christians, just what the world most needs; and the other is, that any who believe in eternal torments as the inevitable portion of the wicked, should dare to hang any others than Christians.

CHINESE OPINION OF MUSIC.—The Chinese Emperor Shan, 2,000 years before Christ, appointed a director of music, "to teach," he said, "our sons, so that the straightforward may yet be mild, the gentle may yet be dignified, the strong not tyrannical, the impetuous not arrogant."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Mr. Potter's articles on Free Churches are just what I have particularly desired in reply to questions asked of me by others, to which I could find for myself no adequate answers. How clear he is in insight and in statement! I have just sent to him a double fee for a renewal of my membership in your Association for next year."

—"I am much indebted to your very enthusiastic friend and admirer for a copy of your paper, containing an article on the 'Management of Children,' which is the best I have ever read on the subject. I trust that that part of the rising generation which dwells under my roof, will have reason to bless both you and me for it."

—"I see, by your issue No. 36, that you delivered a lecture on the 'Relation of Free Religion to Spiritualism,' recently in Toledo. I trust that you will print that discourse, because I believe that it will do good. Spiritualists (and I am one of them) desire to hear your views in relation to this matter."

—"I like your paper very much, and enjoyed reading the article in the last, on 'Religious Revivals,' to my evangelical friends here. I think we need more such lectures, and only wish the paper could be scattered broadcast throughout New England."

—"Its utterances are the most satisfactory to me on the great question of Reason and Authority, of any I have yet found. Hoping THE INDEX may live long, with yourself as its editor, the question of its usefulness is not doubtful."

—"We are amazed that we fail to enlist others in our village as subscribers; but when we remember that a fine lecture fails to obtain aught but a meagre house, our amazement turns to the patience that must wait."

—"Please continue THE INDEX to ———, to whom it has become indispensable. Is it not questionable whether a paper that is so much needed in this thoughtless world, should be made larger or more costly?"

—"We have many unbelievers here, but they are merely negative characters, who blather a great deal about Priestcraft, but will not give a cent to put it down. They have no belief save to make money."

—"THE INDEX is wielding a mighty influence here, and I wish it success. I have been opposed to political and religious papers; but free religion suits me better than orthodoxy."

—"Of course I shall renew my subscription for the paper—the gem of the West. Take no trouble about my Catholic feelings. I quit the 'nuisance' eight years ago—I am in my sixty-eighth year."

—"I apprehend your paper will do much good in liberalizing and moulding the people, and lifting them up to a higher plane of thought. I wish you success, 'inward' at least."

—"I have several promises for more numbers, but at present money is very scarce in our community, and interest in the free religious movement about as scarce as money."

—"Your Free Religion strikes several strings my heart is strung with, and the vibrations are harmonious."

—"I am a subscriber of yours, and intend to be so long as you edit THE INDEX and I live."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The Society will meet next Sunday, December 4, at 7 1-2 o'clock, in Gitskey's Opera House. Mr. Abbot will read an essay in continuation of last Sunday's subject:—"What place does Christianity hold among the true Causes of Modern Civilization?" The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The Club will discuss next Sunday the question—"What are the best methods of conducting a radical Sunday School?" Meeting immediately after that of the Independent Society.

DONATION.—The following is to be added to the list of donations received by the INDEX ASSOCIATION: CHARLES STORRS, New York City, - - $25 00

Poetry.

VOX DEI.

My child, look not so sad—
Thy soul be full of light!
Let truth, that maketh glad,
Scatter the gloom of night.
I would not have thee grovel in the dust,
But stand upon thy feet, be true and just.
What if the road be long?
What if thy life be tried?
Thou canst not wander wrong
With conscience as thy guide.
Be true to thine own self, O noble youth,
And thou shall scale the sunny heights of truth.

Hast thou no work to do,
Nor any charge to keep?
Life's duties, are they few?
Leisure hast thou to weep?
If thou wilt labor, learn and do thy duty;
Thy life will not be drear, but full of beauty.

If thou wouldst happy be,
Obey (and not in part)
The voice that speaks to thee
In thine own musing heart.
Obey it through thy life, and fear no rod;
The voice thou hearest is the voice of God.

The Index.

DECEMBER 3, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our first number is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

ENDS AND MEANS.

The following letter, written by a lady of Massachusetts for whom we entertain the highest respect, and to whom we are under obligation for much encouragement in our work, should have been replied to several weeks ago, and would have been, but for a press of matters that declined to be postponed. It expresses, we suspect, the secret thoughts of many workers for Woman Suffrage at the present time in the old Bay State:—

"May I ask a favor of you? Will you sometime give us (your readers) your views upon this subject:—Is it right to do evil that good may come? I have been led to a thoughtful consideration of it just now by the efforts of the advocates of Woman Suffrage to connect themselves with a party whose platform they cannot endorse, for the purpose of hastening the day which shall crown their labors with success, thereby making a compromise with present evil to secure a future good. If the principle is a just one in any case, it may be in all, it seems to me; therefore I ask, is it ever right?"

To this question, in its general form, we can give but one answer—an unqualified and emphatic No. Whatever we account to be wrong, after thoughtful consideration of all the circumstances in the best light of conscience and reason, it concerns our integrity never to do for any motive under heaven. If the motive is the hope of some ulterior good to humanity, it is only a specious temptation; our duty is not changed. Not even for humanity may we lawfully do any-and-every-thing. There is a supreme duty of self-respect which no claim of another, or of all, can ever over-ride. The human race has no title to any sacrifice which makes the individual a worse man or worse woman. Its own best and highest interests will be consulted, when every man and every woman makes it the chief aim of life to keep an unsullied soul. Nothing which tampers with private integrity or lowers the tone of private character, can ever in the end work aught but mischief to society as a whole. This conviction is the solid, granite foundation of all moral greatness.

We hesitate to make any application of this general principle to the action of the women "leaders" in Boston, not feeling ourself master of all the facts. Mrs. Stone, in particular, has our unqualified esteem, and we are sure that whatever she has done has been done in obedience to a very pure and delicate conscience. Yet we do not see things altogether as she sees them; and we were sorry when she declared she would go with either of the two great parties that should first take up the cause of woman. Can there be a doubt that the Democratic party would do its best, if it should come into power, to reverse the national decision on the negro question? It might not succeed; but it might do a great deal of harm, nevertheless. This being so, no friend of the negro would, under any circumstances, vote with that party until it has in good faith accepted the situation. We cannot see that devotion to woman's cause could ever require infidelity to the negro's cause, which would be the practical result of Mrs. Stone's policy; in case the Democrats should first put woman suffrage into its platform. We feel no interest in woman as woman, nor in the negro as negro; but we feel the deepest interest in both as human beings, who have all the rights of humanity to equal privileges and free development.

Woman suffrage, it is true, must come into politics, since it is a political reform. We cannot, therefore, quarrel with the attempt to make it a political question. Yet we have a choice as to method. Instead of even hinting at affiliation with the Democratic party, let Massachusetts Woman Suffragists consent to the healing of the feud between the two rival Associations, and labor to build up a powerful party for the enfranchisement of woman, wholly free from all "entangling alliances." If necessary, let all the so-called "leaders" in both Associations quietly and magnanimously step aside, and forget all personal ambitions in the cause they together serve. The friends of woman are waiting for an opportunity of combined action; and we count that man or that woman as mournfully selfish who stands wilfully in the way of it. Sure we are that the jealous rivalry now too evident is a serious harm to woman's cause. Instead of dancing attendance on Republican or Democratic Conventions, which, we confess, seems to us, at the least, very un-dignified business, and simply exposes a just reform to very unjust ridicule, a true wisdom, no less than a noble spirit, would require the prompt union of the two Associations on a fair and equitable basis. Some persons, at least, are kept out of both, under the circumstances, from sheer unwillingness to be forced into a side-warfare with their own friends. At this writing, we know nothing of the action to be taken at the Cleveland Convention of the American Woman Suffrage Association; we can only hope it will be liberal and wise. Far more good could be accomplished by a just consolidation of the Associations than by any amount of coquetting with the Republican or Democratic party.

Why is it that reformers almost always put less faith in their own ideas than in the arts and manœuvres of political management? Is it really absurd to trust to moral and intellectual appeals, and to work hopefully until these have produced a change in public opinion? It is not wisdom to be impatient with God's patience. It is not virtue to work even for the divinest ends by methods not also divine. Would that reformers could abate their eagerness for the success of reform itself, until they have first made sure that the means they use will be a moral delight to memory. Perhaps it is our "paganism" that makes us refuse even to the cause of humanity a sacrifice of self-respect. So be it. The world can better afford to lose the trifle of our help, than we can afford to lose our all. Impractical and visionary it may be—mankind so reckon it—but the virtue we covet commands to shun all tortuous paths, and to tread the straight road. If we drop by the wayside before the goal is won, we have no complaint. The success of a great cause is God's concern—to serve it greatly is ours.

REMANDED TO JAIL.

The Detroit Advertiser and Tribune takes us for a Unitarian Doctor of Divinity, in danger of being driven out from the Unitarian denomination:—

"It would be difficult to express in a form sufficiently brief for this article, the various shades of opinion in the Unitarian body. What the more orthodox section believe is pretty evident from the above extract. On the other hand are such advanced radicals as Dr. Abbot, of Toledo, who has repudiated the Christian name and claims to be a theist only, and Mr. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, and Dr. Vickers, of Cincinnati, who repudiate the New Testament histories. There are said to be forty-five avowed Free Religionists among the Unitarians, and as many more who in good part sympathize with them being near a fourth part of the entire denomination. It is thought that any declaration of belief, such as the orthodox party demand, will drive these men off, whereas some of the more charitable think that, if borne with, they will pass out of their present scepticism into a sound position."

We pity the Unitarians. Our very best has been done to relieve them from all responsibility for our course,—as it turns out, all to no purpose. Whatever odium attaches to our position, we are unfeignedly desirous not to involve them in it; and it is almost inexcusable carelessness to represent them as in anywise committed by what we may say or do. The simple fact is that we should not be admitted into any of their Conferences or associations, for the reason that they all, conservatives and radicals alike, profess to stand on a "Christian basis," and can therefore welcome only "Christians" to their fellowship. Their exclusion of non-Christians should of course relieve them from all responsibility for our words or acts, even if we were so brazen-faced as to claim to be one of their number—which we most assuredly do not. Out of regard for justice, we wish the press would cease to lay the burden of our sins on their shoulders.

Nothing could induce the Unitarians to "fellowship" us as a non-Christian. Nothing—we ought to add—could induce us to accept their "Christian fellowship." Now that they have ceased to make the false pretence of perfect freedom, and have avowedly planted themselves on narrow "Christian" grounds, we respect their consistency, which we never did until their late Conference in New York. "Christian" is henceforth their shibboleth. So be it. The world will scrutinize the meaning of that word as never before; and in time it will learn that our protest against it has reasons that no freeman will despise. The last opportunity for the identification of the word "Christianity" with absolute liberty of thought vanished at Syracuse in 1866. Henceforth liberty of thought must be sought outside of the most "liberal" form of "Christian" fellowship. How long radicals will suffer themselves to be caught with that baited hook of "Christian liberty," remains to be seen. Time will show them their own infatuation. But we want it distinctly understood that we, at least, neither swallow that bait nor throw it out to others. Such angling we have no heart for. Let the Unitarians be responsible for their own doings—we will be responsible for ours.

With "Dr." Vickers we would exchange commiserations. Such a doctoring is fatal treatment for radicals. The old maxim—"once a priest, always a priest"—seems painfully true, when we suddenly find ourself manufactured into a "D. D." The gods be more merciful unto us! For a long time back we have been trying in a quiet way (not thinking the point worthy of an open protest) to drop forever that foolish prefix "Rev." But now we are made a "D. D." in-to the bargain! We object. We resign in favor of Mr. Hepworth. We bestow our title on any one who is willing to march through the streets, like a loafer paid by the hour, with ecclesiastical advertisements stuck all over his clothes. Whether with regard to our person or our premises, we put up a standing notice—"POST NO BILLS HERE!"

The December number of The Examiner comes to hand too late for notice this week; but we would call attention to its advertisement in another column. A hasty examination of The Examiner convinces us that it will be very interesting reading to our subscribers. Send fifty cents for a sample copy, or (better still) four dollars for a year's subscription.

We would call special attention to the circulars of "The Radical Monthly," which we copy on a previous page with the hope that some of our readers will feel prompted to respond, and which would have appeared earlier, if our columns had not been lately over-crowded.

THE INDEX circulates in thirty-eight States and Territories of the Union, besides Canada, Nova Scotia, England, Scotland, and Germany.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE LIFE OF BOETHIUS."

"When we consider that Boethius was a Christian, and that, besides his books on the Trinity, he had composed other religious works, we may be surprised that his prison hours were not employed in writing a Consolatio Religionis rather than a Consolatio Philosophiae. The influence of his Christianity is doubtless to be traced in his work, and it possesses a deeply religious character; but it might almost have been written by a pious Greek who had never heard of the Saviour. There is no allusion to Christ throughout the book. All the quotations are from Pagan authors. He discourses upon the vanity of all temporal things, discusses questions of good and evil, fate and Providence, necessity and free will in the Platonics; irit; and the virtue of that greatest of the Greeks, and not the faith of the Christian, is his happiness—nay, is happiness itself. It is the purest example we have of an author adhering rigidly to his thesis. There are no indications that Boethius knew of or felt a deeper or a purer source of consolation than philosophy. This placing Providence above Fate is Christian in its thought, but its treatment is simply philosophic. Socrates and his sublime death, and not Christ and his still sublimer life, suffering, and sacrifice, is his example.

This Christian philosopher finds his peace in, and gathers his consolation and encouragement from, the heroes of Pagan antiquity."

"He seeks for consolation and peace in the great Author of all things, and finds that, although the golden apples of the world are but ashes in the mouth, God and virtue are realities, and in them happiness is to be found. Earth is not to him a wild, weltering chaos, but a divinely-ordered place in which men are to be tried and tested."

CREED VERSUS FREEDOM.

In the present talk about the matter of creed or no-creed among Unitarians there seems to be considerable confusion of ideas, and some confounding of things not to be confounded.

Are there not some first principles here, some primary questions, which, if looked steadily in the face and squarely answered, could help us clear up somewhat this subject?

In the first place, is this question of creed or no-creed a question of principle or it is merely a question of policy?

With the older denominations there is no issue here. There is no dispute whether they shall have a creed or no. With all the wrangling over right doctrines and the true belief, all the evangelical sects believe in creeds. It is no matter of policy. Not even in the form of a necessity of organization is the question of policy raised. It is a matter of principle. It is wholly right to have a creed,—absolutely wrong not to have one. A creed is of the first, of the utmost importance; for upon the acceptance or rejection of certain dogmas rests the soul's salvation or ruin.

The change from the old theology to the new would be pretty sure to produce some modification of this position. The result shows it has. With the Liberals the matter changed ground.

The early Unitarians rejected creeds. Now the question arises, did they do so on principle? If not, there was but one logical alternative, that of policy. For they had abandoned the Orthodox position of the absolute moral necessity of creeds.

Again, the Conservative Unitarians at the present time want a creed. Do they demand it now on principle or is it a matter with them merely of denominational policy?

We believe the old Unitarians were consistent. They meant liberty, but whether their principle led was perhaps not yet fully developed with any of them.

But with all the talk to-day (and some of it is very loud and pretentious) of love and loyalty to liberty, there appears much of incoherency, not to say some throwing of dust in the eyes. The word freedom is not articulated fairly and squarely. On the contrary, the matter seems to be viewed and discussed mainly from the standpoint of policy. And the conclusion is that it is expedient to have a creed, a little one, with the least possible meaning therein—for denominational interests and to ensure sectarian successes; forgetting or ignoring that there is any principle involved.

Even some of the professed Radicals seem not to be clear in this matter. They concede to the Conservatives the perfect right to make a creed if they want one, and that no one can find fault therewith. In fact, they must have a creed in the natural and inevitable course of events, it is argued. As soon as they have an idea and can agree upon it, they have only to inscribe it upon their banner, rally around it and work for it. Otherwise they would be untrue to the past, an anomaly in history.

And all the Radicals have to do is to follow in the footsteps of their more Conservative brethren,—in due course of time unfurl their standard with their idea, their creed, and bear that on. Now there should be no deception in this matter. The above view, if true, would be wholly subversive of the principle of Spiritual Freedom. That new principle of Freedom and the old principles of creeds are in direct antagonism. There is no half-way ground here. They are diametrically opposed to each other as the two poles. They are not merely irreconcilable; each excludes the other. It is not a question here of good or bad, true or false creeds, as among the evangelical sects. It is not a question of long or short creeds, as with the Unitarians. For if we do not believe in creeds, one phrase or one word is just as wrong and just as much as thirty-nine articles.

It does not matter if the creed is an ever so universally accepted truth, or a self-evident proposition even. It is open to the same objection. As a creed it is opposed to the principle of freedom. It is plain to see, on this ground, that the objection to the "Lordship of Jesus" is not because it is a superstition; nor to a "Christian basis" because one may not accept it, but because each is so much creed.

Now a religious association organized on this principle of spiritual freedom cannot possibly have a word or sign of a creed. It cannot be identified with any religious opinions or party. With it the idea of sects drops out of the religious world. As a body it can hold no dogmas, can have no set of religious doctrines to promulgate whatever.

It organizes in the same way, on the same ground, as do analogous associations for analogous aims. Men institute an Astronomical Society for astronomical purposes, for the furtherance of astronomical truth. They do not say they have certain astronomical views which are a finality, and make the acceptance of these a condition of joining and working with them. On the contrary they allow absolute freedom of thought, of investigation, nay, they invite and demand new ideas, new theories, new research.

So the religious society or Church, organized for religious purposes, for furtherance of religious truth, should rest on the same basis of freedom; inviting new ideas, new thought, new truth from every quarter and having no "test" or "condition of fellowship" but the common purpose of furthering the objects for which the organization is called into being.

The Free Religious Association, so-called, is the only religious organization of this character now existing. It is committed to the new principle of freedom. "It was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the new proposition" of absolute religious freedom, if we understand it rightly. That is the basis of the organization, and we believe, in its action as a body, it has made no mistake in this respect, however individuals may have erred.

Now, Mr. Editor, you may have said all that I have here said, a dozen times. Mr. Potter seems to be very clear and explicit on the subject. Yet, from the general drift of the discussions and conclusions afloat, from the action of the late Unitarian Convention, as well as others gone before, and from the acquiescence therein of men calling themselves Free Religionists or at least those professing entire devotion to freedom, it would appear yet necessary that the same truth should be reiterated anew, and that in every possible form. J. W. W.

[Our correspondent is right—we have said substantially the same thing more than "a dozen times." No creed at all—nothing exempted from the scrutiny of thought—absolute freedom of inquiry on all subjects without exception—that is the principle we have battled for most earnestly for years. If the Free Religious Association should make a creed even of religion, by declaring that this word necessarily implies a belief in God, we would quit it as promptly as we quitted the Christian Church. But the Association stands unambiguously pledged to FREEDOM; and by that sign it shall conquer.—ED.]

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE SOUL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—Permit me to say a few words in answer to Mr. Gill. He is doubtless right in saying that we are born with certain proclivities which strongly influence our actions through life. Whether these are hereditary or original, psychical or physical, is not to the present purpose—every body will agree that we are born with them, and that a knowledge of them ought to modify and mitigate all judgment passed upon our behavior. The course of kind and generous conduct which is a triumph of principle in one man, is merely natural and instinctive in another; while the wayward, cruel, and malignant actions of a third might as often be seen by a sufficiently penetrating eye to arise from cerebral malformation or disease, as the ease and carelessness of a fourth from his peculiar mental conformation. Human judgment can seldom know enough to be perfectly just.

But granting all this, it seems to me that Mr. Gill makes a fatal mistake in stopping there, and that to go no farther would be to destroy all moral responsibility. Above and beyond our passions and propensities, there is in each one of us a will, a reason, a me, whose very function it is to control and direct them. This personality is not the sum of desires and faculties, but apart from them, their critic, governor, and judge; and virtue and vice lie in the greater or less obedience it is able to exact. It is what the Quakers call the inner light, and there is a spark of it in the dullest and worst of us. It is, indeed, the original intuition by which we know good from evil, and can say that truth and kindness are better than falsity and malice, and it is executive as well as legislative. For we do not always act according to the strongest inclination of the moment—we frequently subdue it, and act in direct opposition to it. Marshal Turenne, just before a battle, said to his legs, "Ah, you tremble now, but you would shudder a deal more if you knew where I was going to carry you!" This is the central power speaking, and this is the absolute superiority with which it should always speak. It is as separate from all our impulses and propensities as a driver from the horses he guides, and woe to him if, through his negligence, the steeds ever take the bits between their teeth, and dash their master from his rightful pre-eminence, to lie helpless beneath their feet! M.

NECESSITY AND FREE-WILL.

EDITOR INDEX:—Will you permit an outsider to interpose a word in the controversy on the subject of Free-Will and Necessity? Much of the deficiency, it seems to me, results from a misunderstanding of the exact point in dispute. Or rather, I think, if Necessarians and the advocates of Free-Will understood each other fully, there would be little difference of opinion, and consequently no dispute at all. The question, as I understand it, is this: Is the Will, in its decisions, subject to law? That is, can you, as in physical phenomena, from known antecedents predict the consequents; and can you, by varying the antecedents, modify the result? Or, to adopt language more appropriate to the mind, can you, from the knowledge of a man's character and the circumstances in which he is placed, foretell the decision of his will; and can you, by the use of the proper means,—education, the fear of punishment, &c,—modify that decision? If these questions are answered affirmatively, it is all the Necessarian asks; and I believe there are few advocates of Free-Will who would answer them otherwise.

In favor of an affirmative answer we have the testimony of consciousness and universal experience; opposed to it—nothing.

We are fully conscious, in every volition, of an effort to satisfy some desire; and we never consciously act without a motive. Further, we are conscious, very frequently, of a change of purpose resulting from a change of circumstances, bringing into operation a new motive. We are all well aware of the difficulty we occasionally have in "making up our minds," and we are aware also how suddenly the difficulty vanishes in presence of a very strong motive one way or the other. A rogue does not long hesitate about the policy of a contemplated theft, when he finds he is watched. A timid man is greatly emboldened by the presence of witnesses. Fair dealing is assured when there is a certainty of knavery being detected and punished. If then, in every volition, we are conscious of an effort to satisfy some desire, and are conscious, further, of a frequent change of purpose resulting from a change of desire, and are never conscious of an act without some object, it would seem fair to infer that our desires are the causes of our volitions, using the word "cause" in the same sense as when we say, "Heat causes the expansion of metals."

This conclusion, as I have said, is sustained by universal experience. We every day act on the hypothesis that the decisions of the Will are uniform—that, under similar circumstances, a person will always decide the same way. We predict without hesitation what a friend will do or say in any particular emergency; and we foretell with tolerable accuracy the influence any particular motive will exert in the decisions of one with whose character we are familiar. We do not expect exalted principles in one bred in the purlieu of a great city; and we are disappointed if a careful education and a good example do not show themselves in good manners and improved morals.

But if the Will is not the subject of law—if, as Mr. Mansel says in his Prolegomena Logica, "all the antecedent phenomena being precisely the same, I may determine one way to-day and another way to-morrow," it would be clearly impossible to foreknow what course one would pursue under any given circumstances. Yet statistics prove, and the experience of every one will confirm the fact, that we can foretell the conduct where the character is known. No one expects to bribe an honest man, or willingly trusts his property to a thief. We do not think that A would lie to gain an object, and we are sure that B would swear to anything if well paid. What, indeed, are honor and honesty but rules principles of conduct? If the Will is not controlled by motives, honesty is mere sham and virtue but a name. If a man may be honest to-day and a rogue to-morrow—if a life of probity and virtue is no guaranty for future good conduct, all confidence in our fellow men must cease, all belief in honor and virtue is folly, and we should lock our drawer and guard our pocket as carefully in the presence of one whom the world, in its ignorance, calls honest and honorable, as of him who is an outcast from society on account of his crimes; for, according to this hypothesis, they are equally liable to temptation and equally liable to fall,—a conclusion so much opposed, not only to religion and morality, but to constant experience and to common sense, as to refute itself.

DAYTON, OHIO.

THINKER.

VOLTAIRE ON FREE WILL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 7, 1870.

MR. ABBOT.—Do you not think that too much space has already been occupied in your paper with the discussion of the question of the freedom of the will? It is an old metaphysical question, and has been so thoroughly discussed by the ablest philosophers of the past, that it is doubtful if any new light can be thrown upon it. If, however, you think it is a profitable subject to present to your readers, I suggest the insertion of a few passages from Voltaire, as follows:—

"Where is the man who, when he looks into himself, perceives not that he is a puppet of Providence? I think—but can I give myself a thought? Alas, if I thought of myself, I should know what ideas I might entertain the next moment—a thing which nobody knows."

"The proof that we give ourselves no ideas is, that we receive them in our dreams; and certainly it is neither our will nor attention which makes us think in dreams. There are poets who make verses sleeping; geometers who measure triangles. All proves to us that there is a power which acts within us without consulting us."

"The high priest will reply; 'You take liberty away from men.' I reply, No; liberty consists in the faculty of willing and in that of doing what you will. God has made man upon these conditions, and he must be contented with them."

"My priest will persist and say that we make God the author of sin. Then we shall answer him—I am sorry for it; but God is made the author of sin in all systems except in that of the atheists. For if he concurs with the action of perverse men, as with those of the just, it is evident that to concur is to do, since he who concurs is the creator of all."

"If God alone permits sin, it is he who commits it, since to permit and to do are the same thing to the absolute master of all. If he foresees that men will do evil, he should not form men. We have never eluded the force of these ancient arguments; we have never weakened them."

"All that we can say is, that evil is for us and not for God. Nero assassinated his preceptor and his mother; another murders his relations and his neighbors; a high priest poisons, strangles and beheads twenty Roman lords. This is of no more importance to the Being, the Universal soul of the world, than sheep eaten by wolves or by us, or than flies devoured by spiders. There is no evil for the great Being; to him it is only the play of the great machine which incessantly moves by eternal laws."

WM. HENRY BURR.

MATTER AND MOTOR.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir.—In view of your own able and satisfactory remarks upon the articles of Mr. Einstein, as they appeared in THE INDEX for June 11th and July 23d, I confess to some diffidence in attempting to reply at all to his comments upon my article in your issue of September 24th,—those remarks leaving nothing unsaid which is desirable to be said upon the main proposition that my article—"Mover and Moved"—was designed to maintain; i. e., the existence in matter of an intelligent principle or motor, acting as the immanent and efficient cause of all the changes in the forms and conditions of matter that come under human observation.

I really do not see the essential difference in the expressions, "spontaneity by which matter acts," used by him, and that used by myself; for if matter acts by spontaneity, it acts by its own spontaneity, the spontaneity of matter; and it seems to me still, in spite of Mr. Einstein's assertion to the contrary, supported by a quotation from Mr. Spencer (whose opinion, however, is by no means admitted to be of such influence as authoritatively to settle the question) that matter does not act per se, but moves as it is acted upon by an indwelling motor, which I, in common with thousands of others, call Spirit, but which Mr. Einstein may call Force, Spontaneity, or any other term he prefers.

In the fourth paragraph of his reply to my article, Mr. Einstein affects some surprise that I do not yet know that matter not only gave form, but is even now steadily giving form to and taking on form of itself; and kindly advises me, if I do not, to consult the works of younger and more scientific authors than those I seem to have consulted, and to adopt their opinions. Now I certainly do not know that what he asserts is truth, with regard to the action of matter; or that matter and motor are only differently conditioned manifestations of Force, as asserted by Spencer and adopted by himself. For surely, if these propositions be correct, then matter is essentially nothing, and what he calls Force is everything. But would not blind, unintelligent Force (spontaneity) be rather a disorganizer than an organizer, and, like the beggar on horseback, drive to destruction? No, sir, if I see anything, I see that the changes which matter is perpetually undergoing result from the action of the intelligent motor, concerning which nothing yet said by Mr. Einstein necessitates on my part a disavowal of anything I have said. I further see that if the almost universally adopted idea of the substantial existence and inertia of matter is untrue, then Mr. Einstein's view, supported by Mr. Spencer, is true; and that, in their case, if matter can and does act per se, I (not to say "we"), shall be compelled to admit the non-necessity of a God in Nature; but I totally deny that he proves his proposition.

In the fourth paragraph of his quotations from my article, he quotes me as saying—"since matter exists," instead of—"since motion exists." This would make no difference in the statement of his own theory, because with him, matter and motion are essentially the same thing, being only manifestations of Force, whilst in my view motion is an effect produced by the action of a motor immanent in the matter. My proposition was, that motion exists; ergo there must be a mover and something to be acted upon or moved.

It is not plain that matter acts as he asserts, neither does it follow from anything that I have said that the motor has ever been changed, or needs to be changed; nor have I ever dreamed of a motor outside of matter.

I have never asserted or argued the existence prior to matter of the indwelling Spirit or principle; but rather its existence prior to the forms of matter; and I am blind enough not to see anything, in all that Mr. Einstein has said, calculated to change my "antiquated" notions upon the subject.

As I have never raised the question—"Whence your Force?"—always having believed that this question of whence cannot properly be raised, I may leave Mr. Einstein to demolish his own man of straws at his leisure.

I have never instituted a comparison, in the manner or sense Mr. Einstein speaks of, betwixt the human intelligence and that of the intelligent Spirit or God for whose pre-existence I have argued in the sense above explained,—manifesting intelligence, using matter as the medium of its manifestations. I have never asserted that the intelligent motor existed prior to matter, because I could not conceive of the one without the other. I submit once more the question—which of the two is the greater absurdity, the much-scouted miraculous-conception story, or the assumption that matter, unintelligent per se, took on such forms as gave birth to intelligence without the action of an intelligent cause?

If we "can reason only from what we know," we can reason but little, for we know but little; how, then, is our stock of knowledge to be increased, and when and where, if we must know beforehand, had our knowledge a beginning?

I cannot positively assert, with the same degree of confidence as Mr. Einstein, that the man will never be born who will know more than "we"—that is, Mr. Einstein, Mr. Spencer, and the antiquated K. N.; or, that no man will ever be able to solve the mooted question. For myself, I believe it quite probable that there is not a secret of God, in his nature and word, that shall not in due time be revealed to the human mind; and to these future discoveries of science I respectfully invite Mr. Einstein's attention, desiring thus to reciprocate his intended favor to myself.

The fundamental error of Mr. Einstein's reasoning arises from his false notions of the nature of Spirit; but this is a misfortune rather than fault.

Respectfully your friend,

K. N.

P. S. With THE INDEX of October 15th, there came also to hand another paper containing an article on "Spontaneous Generation," a theory which states that there exists the greatest diversity of opinion amongst the "younger and more scientific authors," upon that, as well as upon all kindred subjects. It seems the learned are not exempt from the common liability to misconception.

Oct. 24, 1870.

Parental Infallibility is well set forth in this dialogue. It is a more common and viler vice than the Papal sort:—

"Johnny, I wish you'd put Mr. Graham's measure in the barn."

"Taint Mr. Graham's; it's Mr. Wood's."

"It's Mr. Graham's, I tell you. Don't you suppose I know?"

"Why, father, I—"

"Shut up; I don't allow you to contradict."

"But—"

"Shut up, I say, unless you're older than your father."

Inasmuch as Johnny is aware that he is seven and his father forty-seven, his arithmetic compels him to shut up and walk away.

Now it was very naughty in Johnny to contradict, and it is not of the least importance that he should know whose the peck measure is; so, probably, when the next morning Mr. Wood calls and claims it, Johnny will not be informed of the fact, and if at some future time he ventures to ask,—

"Has Mr. Graham got his measure, pa?" he will receive for answer,—

"Go to the barn and find the hens' eggs."

Now John Green, senior, was not guilty of any of the commonly condemned forms of lying to children. Nothing would have tempted him to tell Johnny that the measure was Mr. Graham's, if he had not really believed so. And yet was not his virtual claim of infallibility really a lie? And was it not a lie which half the parents in the world are continually telling to their children?—Zion's Herald.

A happy and graceful play upon words was once made by our own poet, Longfellow. Mr. Longworth, of Cincinnati, being introduced to him one evening, some one present remarked upon the similarity of the first syllable of the two names. "Yes," said the courteous poet, "but in this case I fear Pope's line will apply—

"Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow."

THADDEUS STEVENS preferred burial in an obscure burying-ground, rather than in either of the two beautiful cemeteries in Lancaster, in both of which he owned lots, because colored people could not be buried there; and over his grave in his obscure resting-place, is a plain marble with his own inscription:—"I lie here because the earth is free to all."—National Standard.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind., Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown, Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE BOSTON LECTURES.

As previously announced, the Free Religious Association is to take charge this season of the course of religious lectures in Boston which has become known as the Sunday Afternoon Horticultural Hall lectures. The Committee entrusted with the matter have arranged the following programme:—

- Jan. 8. OCTAVIUS B. FROTHINGHAM. "The Beliefs of the Unbelievers."
" 15. MARY GREW. "Essential Christianity."
" 23. JOHN WEISS. A new Lecture.
" 29. THOMAS W. HIGGINSON. "The Religion of the Heart."
Feb. 5. FRANCIS E. ABBOT. "Intuitionism versus Science; or the Civil War in Free Religion."
" 12. WM. J. POTTER. "The Doctrine of Immortality in the light of Science."
" 19. DAVID A. WASSON. "The Complaint of Labor."
" 26. SAMUEL JOHNSON. "Theodore Parker, and the Religious Movement of our Time."
Mar. 5. JOHN FISKE. "Auguste Comte, and the Positive Polity."
RALPH WALDO EMERSON. Time and Subject to be announced hereafter.

Nothing need be said here of the success of the Committee in arranging their programme. The list speaks for itself. We have seen somewhere a statement (it was made, we believe, by a Boston correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune), intimating that these lectures under the new management would not give so broad and catholic a representation of religious thought as in previous seasons. We are not aware that any change of this nature has been intended or adopted. On the contrary, we know that the Committee attempted to secure a much wider range of theological opinion than appears on the list; and we are sure they would as readily as the former manager put "Pere Hyacinthe" and "Henry Ward Beecher" in the course, were there any chance of obtaining them. As a matter of fact, the course is as broadly representative as heretofore. Last year, it will be remembered, the lecturers were so uniformly on the "radical line" somewhere, that they were popularly styled, after the phrase of the Independent, "the Twelve Apostles of Heresy."

The Committee had hoped this year to have Keshub Chunder Sen in the course. An urgent invitation was sent to him, but his work in India forbade his coming to this country.

We reprint below a letter which he has sent from Egypt, on his way home, to the friends that had gathered about him in England. It will be seen that the objects which are near his heart are closely allied to those for which the Free Religious Association is organized.

AN INDIAN THEIST'S EPISTLE TO HIS ENGLISH FRIENDS.

EGYPT, Oct. 1, 1870.

Beloved Brethren:—The grace of God be with you. May his holy spirit sanctify and gladden your hearts forever! Accept my brotherly love. With tears I took leave of you and bade adieu to your country's loved shores. For though brief my sojourn in that land, you have won my heart with the power of love. A hundred attractions have endeared you to me, and nothing will, I believe, rend asunder the strong ties of spiritual attachment which bind us together, though physical separation there must be. England is out of sight,—the billows of the mighty sea roll between you and me,—her green fields and lovely flowers, her sweet homes and noble charities no longer greet my eyes; yet in the deep recesses of my heart she has an abiding place. I will continue to love you as my friends, yea, as my brothers and sisters, and will pray to God Almighty for your welfare here and hereafter. I will ever remember with gratitude the kindness and hospitality with which you received me in your homes, and the affection with which you fed me when I was hungry, comforted me when I was weary, and nursed me when I was ill; and I will always carefully preserve the numerous and valuable tokens of love with which you sent me away. England! I am grateful to thee; God bless thee for thy kindness to a poor Indian!

I must thank you also, dear brethren, for the success of my mission. I went to you to advocate the cause of my dear fatherland; and I rejoice when I think of the enthusiasm with which, on several occasions, you assured me of your readiness to redress its grievances and supply its manifold wants. Earnestly do I hope that the interest excited in the subject will ere long assume practical form, and result in the adoption of measures calculated to promote those urgent reforms which I demanded of you—the education of the poor, the improvement of women, the suppression of the liquor traffic, and the removal of civil disabilities in the way of native reformers. Help us, O help us, England! in furthering these great works of reform; and we and our children and generations yet unborn will bless thee.

But a more important and comprehensive mission brought me to your country. God be thanked that it also has borne some fruit. The spiritual union of the East and West—my long-cherished ideal—is not a dream. Sure I am that it will be realized in the fulness of time. My faith has been intensified by what I have seen and heard in England; the religious tendencies of the age have confirmed my hope. There is in every branch of Christ's Church in the West a growing desire to cast off the fetters of sectarianism, and to recognize a broader basis of faith and worship. I am convinced that you are painfully alive to the grave evils which have arisen from the endless multiplication of sects, and that you are beginning to feel that you ought to be more charitable and tolerant towards each other. Your large hearts cannot dwell in small tabernacles. I have also found clear indications of an anxiety to turn away from the letter that killeth to the spirit that giveth life. For eighteen centuries dogma after dogma has been added to the Christian faith, and tenets piled upon tenets till the spirit of Christ has been well-nigh quenched under the crushing weight of a most voluminous theology. Thousands of men and women daily seek Christ in the sepulchre of books and dogmas, churches and rites; but the voice of truth solemnly whispers—He is not there. The waters of life they have sought in the dry well of dogmas, but their thirst is not quenched. And now, taught by the sad lessons of experience, England seems to say—"I am tired of dogmas, I am sick of sects. In the simplicity of living faith I will worship my God; in the sweetness of loving faith I will enter into fellowship with all his children." Such appears to be the craving and tendency of other nations as well. Indeed, the world is moving onward to the consummation of that universal Church which owns no other creed except the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. The history of the past points to it—the present age demands it; everywhere there are cheering indications of its dawning light. It is God's will that it should come. Let his will be done. Let us all unite to up-rear his true Church. Let each nation come with all the elements of truth and goodness in its sacred history, and all that is pure and divine in its national life. No nation, no sect, ought to be excluded, for through each God has spoken, and in each some form of truth is deposited in the flow of ages. Bring with you, English brethren, your noble charities, your industry and earnestness, and your respect for science—that glorious and perennial revelation of God to man. Come, liberal-minded children of America, with your world of modern thought and civilization, and your youthful freshness of mind and soul. Come, all ye nations of the West, with all the riches of truth ye possess. But the circle is not yet complete. Let the nations of the East come with their ancient civilization, their sublime devotion, fervent faith and deep spirituality; let them come with the precious inheritance of thought and sentiment bequeathed by their venerable ancestors of antiquity. Let the East come clad in the golden robe of morning light. Then the circle of universal religion will be completed. Thus shall the Scriptures of science in the West, and the Scriptures of inspiration in the East, constitute together the Word of God. Thus shall the "mind and strength" of the one, and the "heart and soul" of the other, join in the service of God. Thus shall the spirit of charity, which "went about doing all manner of good," and the spirit of devotion which "went to the mountains to pray," blend together and form the unity of divine life in man. Thus shall all sects and races and nations in the world unite to form the catholic church of God, limbs of one body supported by the same vitality, and doing the work of the same Master; a harp of many strings playing harmoniously, and with their blended notes making sweet music in praise of the Great Ruler. And thus shall the prophecy of the past be fulfilled,—"And they shall come from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God." The idea is grand;—is it not? Strive to realize it, my friends; and let your country and mine, and all mankind, reap the fruits of your noble efforts, and be united in the bonds of brotherhood. It is our Father's wish that all his children should join together, and as one sweet family worship Him. Then let us all joyfully gather around Him.

Pausing awhile in the course of my homeward voyage in this ancient country, Egypt, I cast my eyes towards the East and the West, and in the attitude of a suppliant and a servant I humbly implore and beseech my brethren on both sides to hasten to the Father's home. Come, brothers and sisters, from the uttermost parts of the earth, with love and gladness in your hearts, and let us gather round our "Father dear," kiss his holy feet, and sing his sweet name.

"We'll crowd his gates with thankful songs;
High as the heavens our voices raise;
And earth, with her ten thousand tongues,
Shall fill his courts with sounding praise."

God be with you, beloved brethren. May his redeeming grace spread over the whole earth, and bring purity and peace to all his children! Farewell.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

THE ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

"She's got hold o' some invention for grown up people being born again, Sammy; the new birth I thinks they calls it. I should very much like to see that system in haction, Sammy. I should very much like to see your mother-in-law born again. Wouldn't I put her out to nurse!"—Tony Weller.

During the late war, a colored clergyman, feeling constrained to preach against the extortions of the sutlers, from which his little flock had suffered, announced for his text, "Now de serpent was more suttler dan any beast of de field dat de Lord God had made."

A pious old lady in Cincinnati, who is down on actors and theatre-goers, has on her mantel-shelf a bust of Edwin Booth, which some lively nephew has palmed off on the poor old lady for Christ. It answers every purpose; but if she finds out the deception, that nephew needn't expect anything in her will.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, and PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle.

Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

PARTIES AND PARTY SPIRIT.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, in Lyceum Hall, September 24, 1870.]

However deeply one may sympathize with the efforts of the friends of peace to abolish war and to render it impossible for mankind to be ever plunged again into its awful cruelties and horrors, no person who even glances at the record of history can escape the confession that war has been indirectly the cause or the effect of nearly every great forward movement of the human race. A war begun by the royal or would-be royal scourges of mankind has often resulted in great gains to the cause of progress; and conversely, a great reform accomplished at the time by pacific means has often proved the first link in a chain of causes leading ultimately to war. For instance, the causeless proclamation of war against Prussia by the late Emperor of the French has led to the utter overthrow of the Empire that was sucking the very life-blood of the French nation; while the peaceful election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency of the Great Republic was the immediate occasion of our own terrible civil war, which could have been indefinitely postponed by Northern submission to the pro-slavery party of the South. Perhaps no one would dispute the statement that greater advances have been made in civilization within the last hundred years than in any other period of equal length in the history of man; yet it has been a period remarkable for its vast and bloody wars. Out of the first seventy years of the nineteenth century, not one has been a year of unbroken peace. Somewhere or other, war has been continuous throughout these seven decades, and most frequently the parties to it have been the nations regarded as most highly civilized. Since the beginning of the century, Prussia has fought in seven wars, Austria in twelve, Russia in twenty-one, France in thirty-seven, and England in forty-nine,—not to mention the various bloody struggles in Spain, Portugal, Italy, Greece and Crete, and the almost numberless wars waged in Asia, Africa, South America, the West Indies, Mexico, and our own country. The grim dictum of Hobbes that “war is the state of nature,” seems almost to find its verification in facts such as these. Yet it remains true that this nineteenth century stands unrivalled for its triumphs in human advancement.

You will not, of course, misunderstand me as claiming that war has been the direct cause of this advancement. It is not itself progress, nor the true cause of progress; it almost seems, however, that we must concede it to be the black and terrible shadow from which progress cannot free itself, at least under present conditions. To the expanding and self-educating mind of man, seeking ever to climb upwards to a higher level, must we attribute all actual progress gained; yet the laws of his nature, in accordance with which all progress must be made, are by no means what philanthropists would fain believe. Their invectives against the wild and wasteful passions which always burst forth in war, however true they may be from a certain point of view, leave out of account the fact that these very passions are an integral part of human nature, and blindly do a rough and needed work which the calmer and greater attributes of humanity could never perform. War is the blazing forth of elemental forces as dreadful as the volcanic fires hidden under the smiling surface of the earth; and devastating as it is, it nevertheless affords a vent for what might else gather in secret an energy of destructive power sufficient to explode the very planet itself. It is the great seething mass of savagery in human society, incapable as yet of being tamed, that must somewhere find an outlet, or involve the world in ruin. And the good that ultimately results from its terrible outbursts must be referred, not to itself as a direct cause, but to the nobler and finer powers which, relieved from restraining pressure, come into play when brutal forces have spent their fury and sink exhausted into temporary repose. Were it not for these fierce telluric agencies, the conditions of growth would be greatly lessened; for it should never be forgotten that peace also has its fatal dangers, and tends to a moral stagnation, a social corruption, a decay of public spirit and public virtue, from which, together with its own horrors, war seems to bring also a compensating salvation.

At the same time, it is true that war is barbarism. But men are still barbarous. They have but begun to emerge into a true civilization. Between the Hottentot and the European, there are but differences of degree. Our governments, our laws, our customs, our trade, our very ideas, are still largely tinged with barbarism. Christianity itself is a barbarous religion. Now a contest is going on between barbarism and civilization, between higher and lower tendencies, throughout the entire world; and it is only an outward manifestation of the internal contest going on in every human heart between the lower or bestial, and the higher or truly human. In the Darwinian phrase, a “struggle for existence” is perpetually going on, not only between different species of animals and different races or nations of men, but also between higher and lower forms of society, between higher and lower ideas, between virtues and vices in the individual life. War is indeed, in one sense, the “state of nature;” and the very Peace Societies that are striving to do away with war among nations, are vigorous contestants in the higher warfare of ideas. Civilization itself is a declaration of war against barbarism, and the victory is won by transferring the conflict from the physical to the intellectual plane. Even religion is only a declaration of war, and the victory is won by carrying the same conflict up still higher to the plane of moral and spiritual laws. It is a great gain, doubtless, thus to elevate war from a brutal and bloody strife of the passions to the refined antagonism of thought with thought, and of aspiration with aspiration; yet it is not wise to forget that conflict remains the great universal law of Nature, and must evermore manifest itself in the conquest of lower by higher tendencies and propensities. Pure peace would be the extinction of motion, of growth, of all that now makes the universe alive.

It is from this indisputable fact of the universality of war, which crops out so frequently in the death-struggle of armies, and in time of peace manifests itself in the ever-continuous conflicts of ideas or principles, that the existence of antagonistic parties of men appears to be an inevitable result. Look where we will, society is split into countless parties, struggling with each other over different issues. If we look at politics, we always see parties contending for the mastery on some point of public policy. If we look at the church, we see numberless sects or denominations vigorously battling for the triumph of their own special forms of belief. If we look at trade, we see great corporations and an infinity of private firms struggling in endless rivalry of business interests. If we look at science, or philosophy, we behold schools formed on every question, and great emulation among them to secure the ascendancy of this or that mode of thought. Everywhere the same phenomenon presents itself. The parties existing among men may or may not be definitely organized; but even those men who are loudest-mouthed in the denunciation of outward and formal organization are found recognizing the cohesive power of ideas, and co-operating with others of like mind in the attainment of common objects. The fact of party is so plain and undeniable, that the outcry against it sounds truly comical. No man can shake off his likeness to his kind, or resist the sympathy which unites him to the vast army of those who most closely resemble him. The pride of individualism finds its reduction to absurdity in the power of a common thought or purpose to cluster men about it like bits of iron about a magnet. There is something unhealthy in that jealousy of contact with others which makes some minds banish themselves to a certain self-fancied isolation which deceives only themselves. Lookers-on detect without difficulty the affinities and relationships which nobody is eccentric enough to escape, and classify us all with the party, organized or unorganized, to which we naturally belong.

Parties, therefore, are the inevitable result of that contrariety of thinking which is itself the result of our individual differences of mind or character. We all belong to parties, by the simple fact that we are in different stages of development, and that those in the same stage are irresistibly united by community of feeling and of thought. If men are compelled to act on any question, they will invariably be found to range themselves in various groups, each group in itself constituting a party, whether knit by outward ties or not. The entire truth will, in all likelihood, be found in no one of these groups alone; but usually some of them will have the preponderance of truth. The antagonism which exists among them, leading to unlike action, has its root in the difference of education or development which prevents them from all seeing the same thing in the same light. So long as a candid, friendly, and truth-loving spirit prevails among them, no harm whatever can be found in the mere fact of their being divided in sentiment. On the contrary, this great good results, that each, perceiving some part of the truth not perceived by the rest, is able to instruct all who are willing to be instructed; and the truth has thus a far better chance of being ultimately perceived in all its relations than if no parties existed. Instead, therefore, of lamenting the existence of parties among men, I find in it fresh proof of that wisdom in Nature which reveals itself to all who will patiently study her lessons.

There is, however, ground for the suspicion and jealousy with which many of the best minds look on parties when closely organized. There are few who can or do distinguish between the policy of an organized party and the idea it was formed to serve. Under the stress of particular emergencies, the party leaders (for closely organized parties invariably come to have leaders) will almost always mould the action of the party so as to secure some immediate end, which they may fancy indispensable to ultimate success. This immediate end looms up before them as more important than it is, and may really lead them aside from pursuit of the main end of the party. With perfect honesty, therefore, the leaders may lead astray. Or perhaps (as is commonly the case) some personal ambition in the leaders helps to warp their adopted policy from strict conformity with the true end in view, and they use the influence they have acquired in thus defeating the common object. Nothing is more frequent in the history of parties than this artful betrayal of their followers by the leaders; and the treachery may not be discovered until too late. The career of Andrew Johnson is too fresh in many minds not to recur as an illustration of this sort of treason. It seems to be a fact that no very closely organized party has ever kept itself out of the power of leaders; and the dangers of submitting to leadership are neither small nor few. A majority of persons, perhaps, will acquiesce in what their leaders propose, without maintaining a watchful comparison at every step between the primary purpose and the adopted policy of their party; and many are thus led astray by mere sluggishness of mind to sanction others in doing what they would not do themselves. The fact that their party does thus or so, is a sufficient guarantee to them that the thing ought to be done; and the result is a loss of independence, and perhaps complicity with the plans of rascally leaders.

Another influence comes in to increase this danger. An esprit du corps grows up in parties too systematically organized which tends to override the private conscience and reason. Men come to have a pride in their party as such, altogether irrespective of its principles or objects; nor is there anything more dangerous either to the individual member or to the public. It makes them partisans instead of patriots, or patriots instead of cosmopolites. It makes them willing to sacrifice the good of all for the good of their immediate associates. It makes them narrow-minded, selfish, and unjust, and degrades the love of man into the love of a mere clique. Whoever cries—"My party, right or wrong!" or "My country, right or wrong!" simply avows himself a victim of this epidemic of partialism. The peril of this belittling attachment to a part instead of the whole is very real, and forms a very grave and just objection against the encouragement of parties. Especially hateful is this tendency in religion, giving rise to sectarianism, bigotry, and a thousand unnatural and vicious traits of character. I cannot wonder that many of the noblest persons acquire so intense a horror of this voluntary degradation of partizanship, that they prefer to stand aloof from parties altogether, and decline to co-operate with any body of men for even the highest objects. Certainly, if one is obliged to choose between degradation on the one hand and usefulness on the other, virtue and wisdom ratify the choice they make. Much as I desire to be useful, I should not seek even usefulness at the price of a forfeited self-respect. Whatever makes me narrow-minded, or binds me to servile obedience to leaders, or creates in me a blind and clannish devotion to a mere party, would justify me in a refusal to co-operate with any party. I shall accomplish in the end far more good to my fellow-men by living a large and rounded life, even in partial isolation, than by any services I could render in a party by the sacrifice of this. Parties may do great good; but party-spirit does vast evil. If parties could not exist without party-spirit, by which I mean a greater eagerness for party success than for universal ends, I should hold myself aloof from them forever.

But so long as there is a safe-guard against the evils I speak of, it becomes a confession of weakness to adopt seclusion as the only self-protection against them. This safe-guard depends on my own strength of will and clearness of insight. I am willing to co-operate with any party professing objects I approve, with this proviso, that I always claim and exercise the right of independently comparing the party policy with the party's objects, and the right of "bolting" whenever I find that the former betrays the latter. If I have mental and moral power to do this, I can always contribute my support to the party while it goes right, and withdraw myself untarnished and incorrupt when it goes wrong. This independent judgment on the action of associates is indispensable; and so is the withdrawal from them, if their action is injurious or unjust. Whoever feels himself unable to guard himself in this way against the seductions of party-spirit, or the encroachments of party-leaders, will do well to keep clear of all parties; but this is evidently a confession either of mental or moral weakness. It depends on the individual alone whether he will be free and superior to temptation. Given sufficient strength, he cannot feel afraid of any affiliation with his fellows; and with consciousness of this strength, he is neither more nor less than selfish, if mere temperamental daintiness holds him back from soldierly service in the ranks.

Every great movement in behalf of humanity leads to organized action,—to the formation of parties. This cannot be helped, nor need it be. It is idle to cry out against the parties themselves. I accept facts as they are, and mean to keep myself a free man while accepting them. The modern world is learning the enormous value of intelligent and free co-operation; for it is a triumph of the democratic spirit. The people to-day refuse to have things done for them; they resolve to do things for themselves. In order to do them, they must combine their energies and their wits, utilize the peculiar power of each individual, and march side by side to the accomplishment of results. Party is simply co-operation. It is not servitude, if the rank and file have brains; for so-called leaders are only servants, if they do but execute the will, and carry out the thought of the people. Presidents are not kings, though entrusted with far more power than most kings possess. There is even no honor in their election, except on the admission that it is an honor to be permitted to serve. It is well to be jealous, exceedingly jealous, of leadership; for, as the world goes, leaders too often forget that they are simply servants. The moment a servant sets up for master, let him be promptly dismissed; and I, for one, shall never cease to regret that the American people failed to dismiss that impudent usurper, Andrew Johnson, by the back-door of impeachment. It showed a deficient national self-respect that they failed to do so. There need be no danger from leaders, none from party-spirit, the moment the people have become sufficiently intelligent and self-centred. Parties are essential in this age for the carrying-out of common objects; and the only precaution needed against their abuse is the increase of personal independence and rectitude among the people.

From what I have said, you may infer that I favor the formation of a party for the spread of Free Religion. I do. But it will not be an ecclesiastical sect, nor like one. I do not want it until it comes of itself. Nor will the need of it be felt, until the American people waken to a consciousness of the spiritual servitude under which they live. Free-thinkers themselves are so habituated to the thousand and one assumptions of superiority by the adherents of the popular Christianity, that they content themselves with a little growling in private, and are too indifferent to make a vigorous and determined effort to break the system that thus dares to insult them. This will not always be so. By and by American liberals will perceive that there is in public opinion no real or recognized equality of religious rights,—that the temper of the Christian church is against the removal of the existing inequalities,—that a battle has yet to be fought before America is free in spirit as in laws. I have no wish whatever to antedate the struggle. But I mean to do my share in spreading ideas that must hasten it. The party whose formation I expect and favor, will not be "made" by any one, but will grow up of itself in due time. The aggressions of Catholic and Protestant orthodoxy will shorten this time. It will be a party which cares nothing for building up any dogmas, or system of dogmas, but will limit its activity to the destruction of the dogmatic systems that exist, in order that a better spirit may pervade society. It will be a party that cares more for its ends than for itself as a means, and less for its leaders than either. It will seek to create such respect for thought, that all thinkers shall meet on equal terms, and no privilege be conceded to pious thoughtlessness.

There can be no party-spirit among men really infused with the ideas of Free Religion,—no slavery to leadership, no willingness to be led except by the love of truth and regard for the real advancement of mankind. For a party earnestly devoted to such ideas, there is to-day urgent need; and thousands of bewildered and enslaved minds will hail it as the negroes at the South hailed the Republican party. The spirit of the times, which is gradually but surely creating it, is, I believe, thus laying the foundations of a universal brotherhood on the earth.

DARWINISM AND NATIONAL LIFE.

[From "Nature," Dec. 16, 1869.]

The Darwinian theory has a practical side of infinite importance which has not, I think, been sufficiently considered. The process of natural selection among wild animals is of necessity extremely slow. Starting with the assumption (now no longer a mere assumption) that the creature best adapted to its local conditions must prevail over others in the struggle for existence, the final establishment of the superior type is dependent at each step upon three accidents—first, the accident of an individual sort or variety better adapted to the surrounding conditions than the then prevailing type; secondly, the accident that this superior animal escapes destruction before it has had time to transmit its qualities; and, thirdly, the accident that it breeds with another specimen good enough not to neutralize the superior qualities of its mate. In the case of domesticated animals the progress is incomparably more rapid, because it is practicable, first, to modify the conditions of life, so as to encourage the appearance of an improved specimen; next, to cherish and protect it against disaster; and, lastly, to give it a consort not altogether unworthy of the honor of reproducing its qualities. The case of man is intermediate in rapidity of progress to the other two. The development of improved qualities cannot be insured by judicious mating, because as a rule human beings are capricious enough to marry without first laying a case for opinion before Mr. Darwin.

A glance at the operation of Darwinism in the past will best show how potent it may be made in the future. Look at English progress and English character, and consider from this point of view to what we owe it. There were originally some natural conditions favorable to the growth of our commercial and manufacturing energy. We had an extensive coast and numerous harbors. We had also abundance of iron-stone in convenient proximity to workable coal. Other nations either wanted these advantages, or were ignorant that they possessed them. These favorable conditions developed in many individuals a special adaptability to commercial pursuits. The type was rapidly developed and continually improved, until England stood, in the field of commerce, almost alone among the nations of the world. And what is there now to sustain our pre-eminence? Nothing, or next to nothing, except the type of national character, which has been thus produced. Steam, by land and sea, has largely diminished the superiority which we derived from the nature of our coast; and coal and iron are now found and worked in a multitude of countries other than our own. Our strength in commerce, like our weakness in art, now rests almost exclusively on the national character which our history has evolved.

Take another example of the character of a people produced partly by natural conditions of existence, but far more by the artificial conditions to which evil legislation has exposed it. What has made the typical Irishman what he now is? The Darwinian theory supplies the answer. Ireland is mainly an agricultural country, with supplies of mineral wealth altogether inferior to those of England, but by no means contemptible if they were but developed. This is her one natural disadvantage, and it is trifling compared with those which we in our perversity created. For a long period we ruled Ireland on the principles of persecution and bigotry, and left only two great forces at work to form the character of the people. All that there was of meanness and selfishness and falsehood was tempted to servility and apostasy, and flourished and perpetuated itself accordingly. All that there was of nobleness and heroic determination was drawn into a separate circle, where the only qualities that throve and grew were irreconcilable hatred of the oppressor and resolute but not contented endurance. The two types rapidly reproduced themselves, and as long as the external conditions remained unaltered, they absorbed year by year more and more of the people's life; as, if Darwinism is true, they could not but do. And what is the result now? A great part of a century has elapsed since we abandoned the wretched penal laws, and yet none can fail to see in Ireland the two prevailing types of character which our ancestors artificially produced, the only change being that the two types have become, to a certain extent, amalgamated in a cross which reflects the peculiarities of each. Whether future legislation may so far modify the conditions of Irish existence as to work a gradual change in the national character, is a question of much interest, but too large to be discussed just now. In any case we can scarcely expect the results of centuries upon a national type to be reversed in less than a succession of generations.

Still confining myself to the past, let me point again to the very marked qualities which the conditions of their existence have produced in the people of the United States. They started with a large element of English energy already ingrained into them; they have been reinforced by millions of emigrants presumably of more than the average energy of the various races which have contributed to swell the tide. Added to this, the Americans have enjoyed the natural stimulus of a practically unlimited field for colonization. Only the resolute, self-reliant settler could hope to prosper in the early days of their national existence; and self-reliance approaching to audacity is the special type of character which on the Darwinian hypothesis we should expect to see developed, transmitted and increased. How far this accords with actual experience, no one can be at a loss to say. There is probably not a nation in the world whose peculiarities might not be traced with equal ease to the operation of the same universal principle. And the moral of the investigation is this: Whenever a law is sufficiently ascertained to supply a full explanation of all past phenomena falling within its scope, it may be safely used to forecast the future; and if so, then to guide our present action with a view to the interest and well-being of our immediate and remote descendants. Read by the light of Darwinism, our past history ought to solve a multitude of perplexing questions as to the probable supremacy of this or that nation in times to come in the field of commerce, as to the effects of emigration and immigration on the ultimate type likely to be developed in the country that loses and in that which gains the new element of national life, and many another problem of no less interest to ourselves and to humanity.

The subject I have thus slightly indicated seems to me to deserve a closer investigation than it has yet received: and, strange as it will sound to the ears of politicians, I cannot doubt that, in this and other ways, statesmen, if they could open their eyes, might derive abundant aid from the investigations of science, which they almost uniformly neglect and despise.

CREDULITY AND SKEPTICISM.

[From Buckle's "History of Civilization in England," Vol. I, pp. 241-243.]

It is difficult for an ordinary reader, living in the middle of the nineteenth century, to understand that only three hundred years before he was born, the public mind was in the benighted state disclosed in the preceding chapter. It is still more difficult for him to understand that the darkness was shared not merely by men of an average education, but by men of considerable ability, men in every respect among the foremost of their age. A reader of this sort may satisfy himself that the evidence is indisputable; he may certify the statements I have brought forward, and admit that there is no possible doubt about them; but even then he will find it hard to conceive that there ever was a state of society in which such miserable absurdities were welcomed as sober and important truths, and were supposed to form an essential part of the general stock of European knowledge.

But a more careful examination will do much to dissipate this natural astonishment. In point of fact, so far from wondering that such things were believed, the wonder would have been if they had been rejected. For in those times, as in all others, every thing was a piece. Not only in historical literature, but in all kinds of literature, on every subject,—in science, in religion, in legislation,—the presiding principle was a blind and unhesitating credulity. The more the history of Europe anterior to the seventeenth century is studied, the more completely will this fact be verified. Now and then a great man arose, who had his doubts respecting the universal belief; who whispered a suspicion as to the existence of giants thirty feet high, of dragons with wings, and of armies flying through the air; who thought that astrology might be a cheat, and necromancy a bubble; and who even went so far as to raise a question respecting the propriety of drowning every witch and burning every heretic. A few such men there undoubtedly were; but they were despised as mere theorists, idle visionaries, who, unacquainted with the practice of life, arrogantly opposed their own reason to the wisdom of their ancestors. In the state of society in which they were born, it was impossible that they should make any permanent impression. Indeed, they had enough to do to look to themselves, and provide for their own security; for, until the latter part of the sixteenth century, there was no country in which a man was not in great personal peril, if he expressed open doubts respecting the belief of his cotemporaries. Yet it is evident that, until doubt began, progress was impossible. For, as we have clearly seen, the advance of civilization solely depended on the acquisitions made by the human intellect, and on the extent to which those acquisitions are diffused. But men who are perfectly satisfied with their own knowledge will never attempt to increase it. Men who are perfectly convinced of the accuracy of their opinions will never take the pains of examining the basis on which they are built. They look always with wonder, and often with horror, on views contrary to those which they inherited from their fathers; and while they are in this state of mind, it is impossible that they should receive any new truth which interferes with their foregone conclusions. On this account it is, that although the acquisition of fresh knowledge is the necessary precursor of every step in social progress, such acquisition must itself be preceded by a love of inquiry, and therefore by a spirit of doubt; because without doubt there will be no inquiry, and without inquiry there will be no knowledge. For knowledge is not an inert and passive principle, which comes to us whether we will or no; but it must be sought before it can be won; it is the product of great labor, and therefore of great sacrifice. And it is absurd to suppose that men will incur the labor, and make the sacrifice, for subjects respecting which they are already perfectly content. They who do not feel the darkness, will never look for the light. If on any point we have attained to certainty, we make no further inquiry on that point; because inquiry would be useless, or perhaps dangerous. The doubt must intervene before the investigation can begin. Here, then, we have the act of doubting as the or-iginator, or, at all events, the necessary antecedent of all progress. Here we have that skepticism, the very name of which is an abomination to the ignorant; because it disturbs their lazy and complacent minds; because it troubles their cherished superstitions; because it imposes on them the fatigue of inquiry; and because it rouses even sluggish understanding to ask if things are as they are commonly supposed, and if all is really true which they from their childhood have been taught to believe.

The more we examine this great principle of skepticism, the more distinctly shall we see the immense part it has played in the progress of European civilization. To state in general terms, what in this introduction will be fully proved, it may be said that to skepticism we owe that spirit of inquiry, which during the last two centuries has gradually encroached on every possible subject; has reformed every department of practical and speculative knowledge, has weakened the authority of the privileged classes, and thus placed liberty on a surer foundation; has chastised the despotism of princes; has restrained the arrogance of the nobles; and has even diminished the prejudices of the clergy. In a word, it is this which has remedied the three fundamental errors of the olden time—errors which made the people in politics too confiding, in science too credulous, in religion too intolerant.

This rapid summary of what has actually been effected, may perhaps startle those readers to whom such large investigations are not familiar. The importance, however, of the principle at issue is so great, that I propose in this introduction to verify it by an examination of all the prominent forms of European civilization. Such an inquiry will lead to the remarkable conclusion that no single fact has so extensively affected the different nations as the duration, the amount and above all the diffusion of their skepticism. In Spain, the church, aided by the Inquisition, has always been strong enough to punish skeptical writers, and prevent, not indeed the existence, but the promulgation of skeptical opinions. By this means the spirit of doubt being quenched, knowledge has for several centuries remained almost stationary. But in England and France, which, as we shall presently see, are the countries where skepticism first openly appeared, and where it has been most diffused, the results are altogether different; and the love of inquiry being encouraged, there has arisen that constantly progressive knowledge to which these two great nations owe their prosperity.

NOTHING VERSUS ORTHODOXY.

[From the Milwaukee Index.]

We had determined to notice an article in a recent issue of our Toledo namesake—on "Repentance and Forgiveness"—but as we could not school our conscience to the task, and especially to the insertion in our columns of the blasphemous twaddle it would be necessary to quote, in order to give our readers a specimen of "radical religion"—the "religion of free thought"—or whatever other name may best suit the ravings of the writer in question.

An honest man, who differs from us in religious opinion, forfeits none of our esteem.

Infallibility in matters of religious faith is no part of our life burden; we believe through God's guidance we have found the true way; and Christ is our "way"—our "truth"—and our "life."—Let a man deny Christ, the quarrel is not ours; it is one he must settle for himself.

Let a man deny that he needs a Savior—deny that he has anything to repent of—anything to be forgiven—for that, also, is a matter he must settle with his conscience, if he can afford to keep one; and with his God, if indeed he does not claim to be a god himself, which we half believe to be the case with the writer of said article. These are our views; nor will we allow even the writer in question to lay down "orthodox" views for us, about Christ and sin, and repentance, and forgiveness, and hell. The opinions of the Toledo INDEX on orthodoxy are, we suppose, the opinions of the editor—they are not our views of orthodoxy. We pronounce the so-called orthodox opinions of the article in question religious burlesque of the broadest type—and the whole article on the gravest subjects the ravings of a religious blatherskite. There, now, we have done it; we did not mean to call names, but the temptation in this case is irresistible for once, at least, to call things by their right names.

Seriously, it would be refreshing, if these advanced "thinkers" (ahem) would give us something in the shape of an argument—something to reply to.

Gentlemen, it does not pay to spend one's time and strength threshing straw. We have our faith, our creed, if you please. We have our "Christ and his salvation"—our sense of sin—repentance—pardon—hope of heaven—"peace on earth and good will toward all men, with glory to God in the highest"—what have you got better? In the name of reason, tell us; tell us calmly—don't rave and stamp and foam, vide the Toledo INDEX—keep cool and tell the truth about orthodoxy—yes, gentlemen, "new lights"—tell the truth about orthodoxy—the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Do this, and we hail you, do this and here's our hand, but will you do it?

Will you state the question fairly, and argue it calmly? We doubt, yes, we doubt.

The fact is, you deal in half truths: half truths make up the little life that is in you; and alas! for your boasted "advanced thoughts," for your half truths, that as such you are indebted to—"orthodoxy"—half truths you have begged, borrowed, or stolen. Do we understand each other now?

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I like your paper very much, though in all things I cannot agree with you. Though I cannot see your personal God, I am quite willing you should have one. I believe that all without exception that recognize a God have one after their own heart; and the Orthodox all have a Devil after their own image, so I conclude that your God is not a very wrathful one, and perhaps just at this time it would be well enough to hold on to him a spell longer at least. I feel confident that you are doing a good work, and I should be glad to have your subscription list outstrip that of The Independent, though that paper is doing a big work in its own way. Don't be in a hurry about enlarging THE INDEX; it is plenty large. What is wanted is few words and to the point."

"I have received your confidential circular to subscribers, and have tried to procure new subscribers to THE INDEX with very small success. I send you only one. He was the only one I talked with who was heart and soul for the good cause you represent. As to the others—you know the average timorous Orthodox mind which would, but dare not be free, I am sorry that your circular is confidential. I have longed to show it to some friends of mine, and feel quite certain that its thoroughly manly tone would do more for the cause you have devoted yourself to, than any efforts of mine."

"It is but about two weeks since I became acquainted with your paper. For nearly twenty years I have been known as a firm believer in modern Spiritualism, and yet I have never wanted a sect called Spiritualists. I have all that time yearned to see all the friends of free thought and free expression making common cause against every form of ecclesiastical tyranny. You may therefore judge that I am pleased with the object and spirit of your paper. I go further. I shall avail myself of the earliest opportunity to enroll myself in the ranks of those who are publicly struggling for Free Religion."

"I heartily wish you success, although I am outside of all churches and creeds, and a supporter of The Investigator of Boston and The Liberal of Chicago; hence you can understand where I am. But I consider your exertions grand, noble, and will do great good generally."

"Enclosed find fifty cents. I am very much pleased with the tone of THE INDEX. There are hundreds of young men in our colleges preparing to emancipate themselves from the bondage of form, creed, and dogmatic superstition."

"I heartily commend the paper and the work it is doing. Not to go forward is to go backward, in religion as in everything else."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The Society will meet next Sunday Evening, December 11, at 7 1-2 o'clock,—place to be announced in the Toledo Blade. Mr. Abbot will read the third lecture on the question:—"What place does Christianity hold among the true Causes of Civilization?" The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The Club will meet immediately after the Independent Society, and discuss the question necessarily postponed last Sunday by the failure to secure a place of assembly.

THE CARRIER DOVE.

A MADRIGAL.

Pelting with pearls each idle gale,
A merry fount upsprang,
And blithely through the listening vale
Its fairy laughter rang.

Adown the maiden's shoulders wound
Tresses of rippling jet;
Her brow the dazzled sunshine crowned
With Day's own coronet.

"Sweet dove with wings of stainless snow,
Hie thee, oh haste away!
Beside yon fount she carols low
A dear remembered lay."

"A flower I have, of beauty rare,
Blue as the sapphire stone;
To her my only treasure bear—
Pr'ythee, sweet dove, begone!"

I watched his bright wings meet and part,
Like stars that kissed and fled;
How rushed life's rivers through my heart,
As swiftly on he sped!

She smiled a glad and radiant smile,
And to her bosom fair
The winged snowflake pressed awhile,
And stroked his white plumes there.

Soon from his lovely prison freed,
Once more in upward flight
The captive woke his slumbering speed,
And clove the morning light.

Alas! Love's blossom from his wing
Unheeded slipped, and lay
Lost at her feet, a withering thing,
To waste its soul away.

And she and my bright, foolish dream
Together glided by;
Yet aye the little wanton stream
Sings of her memory.

Farewell, fleet Hope! thy pinions white
Flash on and upward ever,
And melt in yonder sea of light
Like raindrops in a river.

Ah, vainly would my spirit flee
Thy radiant home to share;
How can it soar to Heaven with thee,
While Love lies withering there?

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our first number is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

ORTHODOXY SCARED BY ITS OWN IMAGE.

On a previous page we reprint for the benefit of our readers an editorial by Rev. I. L. Hauser, of the Milwaukee Index, on an essay of ours in the forty-fourth number of THE INDEX. Its grammar we modestly confess ourself unable to comprehend; but, since our "blasphemous twaddle" was unfit for publication in the columns of our namesake, we would make what amends we can for giving poison to our readers by now giving them the antidote, and trust that our critic's piety will overbalance his syntactical eccentricities. The only intelligible point of criticism—if that can be called a criticism which does not criticise, but confines itself to railing—is that we have ventured to "lay down orthodox views" for Rev. Mr. Hauser which he regards as "burlesque of the broadest type." We are concerned at such a charge as this, since it lies against the authority we quoted—John Calvin; and it makes us shudder to think of his burlesquing orthodoxy. It seems fair to conclude that the gravest and most solemn statement of orthodoxy is the worst possible burlesque upon it.

One other point we notice. The Index is very careful not to specify wherein we have failed to represent orthodoxy fairly, and does not cite a single statement of ours which it ventures to controvert. We are quite used to this sort of criticism. The Dover (N. H.) Morning Star once accused us of "caricaturing" Evangelical views in our lecture on "Religious Revivals." We addressed to its gentlemanly editor a private note, requesting him to state wherein we had caricatured them. His reply, acknowledging the courteous terms of our request, promised compliance with it; but we have never yet had the pleasure of receiving the correction of our misrepresentations. We expect no better satisfaction, when we invite the editor of the Index to state plainly wherein we have burlesqued orthodoxy; although we promise to republish his exposure of our "raving and stamping and foaming" falsehoods.

The mischief is that orthodoxy is ashamed of itself in these days, and seeks nervously to hide its defection from its own standards under noisy protestations of fidelity to them. Old phrases are retained, but emptied of old meanings. Old creeds are loudly reiterated, while old doctrines are quietly discarded. That is the matter with the editor of the Index, who is evidently out of humor with orthodoxy, but does not dare to say so. If he should venture to state in plain English his own hybrid theology, he might appear nearly as heretical as we. It gives him now a terrible fright to hold up before his eyes a photograph of genuine orthodoxy. A few years hence, the sight of that Gorgon's head will cause a universal stampede from the churches. That is better than turning men to stone.

If we have not greatly misunderstood the matter, the editor of the Boston Investigator regards himself as an atheist and materialist, and accepts those names. He often argues against Spiritualism, which he manifestly considers mere superstition. Yet in the last number of his paper we find a lesson taught which might well be laid to heart by our "Evangelical" exchanges. A Prof. Wetherell had called the Spiritualists "Spiritists," and the editor of the Investigator criticised him for doing so. Somebody in turn sends a criticism on the critic, who thus replies:—

"The Professor is right, philologically, or according to Worcester and Webster; we yield the point, as a candid man ought to do when he finds himself cornered; though, as we said, 'Spiritist' is not in our Dictionary, which is Webster's abridged—hence our mistake.

But notwithstanding this error we are right per Chesterfield, who says in his great book on manners that nicknames must never be used. Now 'Spiritist' is a nickname, or so regarded by Spiritualists to whom it is applied, and therefore it should not be used, nor ought it to be though it were in the Dictionary—in Webster's even. 'Villain' is to be found there, but what gentleman in his senses would ever think of applying that epithet to respectable editors? Hem!

Let us always call a class of people by the denominational name which they give themselves. This is no more than just; it is what is conceded to all parties, and the Spiritualists are as much entitled to this courtesy as any other people. Our Christian correspondent would not relish the practice of being called by a term which he deemed a nickname. He would think, as we do, that it was not only not gentlemanly, but directly contrary to the good rule which says, 'Do unto others as you would have other do unto you.'

Christian vituperators will please take notice that the atheist practises the Golden Rule which they only preach.

WHO IS RIGHT?

The Toledo Blade of Dec. 2 had the following among its local notices:—

"There will be a free discussion at Lyceum Hall Sunday evening, December 4th, commencing at 7 o'clock.

Resolved, That the so called Free Religious move [movement?] is calculated to dwarf man's spiritual nature and blunt his aspirations for a higher life, and drive him into the coldest atheism.

Resolved, That we offer in evidence (by comparison) a knowledge of man's immortality as taught by Spiritualism.

All are invited to take part in the discussion."

The next day we received the following letter from a lady (personally unknown) residing in the State of New York:—

"I see that my time of subscription for THE INDEX is about to expire, and, as I don't want to lose a single number, I hasten to enclose one dollar for the next six months. I thank God that there are those who boldly declare the truth as they themselves see it. I have been a reader of THE INDEX but a few months; but I cannot afford to do without it. It deserves a wider circulation, and should be read by every liberal family in the country. I hope to be able to secure a few subscribers for it soon. Its noble truths, so fearlessly proclaimed, must dispel the dark shades of superstition. Although a Spiritualist in my belief, I am also a firm advocate of 'free religion,' for nothing else so fills the longings of my nature, and I find nothing in it in opposition to my belief in Spiritualism. When truth is presented to me, I gladly accept it from whatever source. May the noble little INDEX continue to dispense its good things to a world hungering for spiritual food!"

We are sorry that any liberal person should so completely misapprehend the free religious movement as the above resolutions imply. To Free Religion all questions are open, to be settled by human reason alone through a candid and scientific study of established facts. It is not necessarily spiritualistic or materialistic, theistic or atheistic, but will be whatever the fearless and faithful pursuit of truth shall make it; and it must be the ultimate faith of all persons except those who doggedly refuse to submit their opinions to the test of experience and thought. There can be no antagonism between Free Religion and any form of faith which has a better basis than blind prejudice and stubborn dogmatism.

Especial attention is called to the advertisement of Mr. Frothingham's sermons. The fine thought, catholic spirit, and graceful style of Mr. Frothingham have made him one of the most influential religious reformers of the time, and whoever orders these discourses will find himself richly rewarded for the trifling trouble and expense. The entire series can be had for only seventy cents.

We are glad to be informed that a Radical Club is to be organized soon at Dayton, Ohio, the preliminaries being already arranged.

A REMONSTRANCE FROM A METHODIST CLERGYMAN.

BROOKFIELD, MASS., Nov. 11, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—There are members of my society here who, a few years ago, were Sabbath-breakers, profane, ill-disposed, reckless, and even riotous. They are now "clothed and in their right mind." They are orderly, industrious, sweet-spirited, exemplary in conduct, faithful to their families, and benevolent towards the needy. This is the result of that "dirt-eating orthodoxy" you so intensely hate. The statistics of benevolence and philanthropy furnish indubitable evidence that at least nine-tenths of our literary, and especially our benevolent institutions, have been endowed by professing Christians. They were awakened to their duty in this direction by the religion which they had embraced. This is the result, practically carried out, of a "dirt-eating orthodoxy."

Nearly all those, male and female, who, either at home or abroad, in the domestic or foreign field, in the city or wilderness, are toiling in the missionary field, are toiling under the auspices of the Christian Church, and are maintained by the hard earnings of Christian people. This is another result of a "dirt-eating orthodoxy," of this "night-mare religion," which can inspire, in rational minds, only sentiments of horror and disgust. None are readier to cry—"By their fruits," &c., than Free Religionists. Why is it you persistently refuse to recognize this kind of testimony on behalf of the claims of Evangelical Christianity? When Free Religion shall achieve any such practical results as those just indicated, or even bid fair to, we shall be but too happy, I think, to give you all proper credit therefore. Until you do something of this kind, is it gracious, much less generous, to be continually making these bitter flings at the Evangelical body?

Now I have no more sympathy with cant than you. I abominate as heartily as you can this free and easy use of the "stock phrases of a sect,"—the glib and flippant utterances of conventional phrases which have long since become discharged of their meaning, and rendered thrice threadbare by numberless repetitions. If a man really feels that he is a vile worm, why let him say so; and I will pity him, and deplore the teaching which has borne such fruit. If he utters such language simply from the force of habit, I am tempted to despise him. But to charge that it is the tendency of orthodoxy proper, or the Evangelical faith, to "paralyze every influence that would make men manly, courageous, truthful, and free," that it is calculated to undermine self-respect and debauch manhood, that it is "saturated and steeped in terrorism," that the great bulk of its influence is "hateful," and as such to be dreaded and deplored, is charging what is directly contradicted by the most palpable facts. An African Prince was once asked why he believed the Bible divine. He replied,—"Because I find, as a matter of fact, all good men, as a rule, calling it so, and minding it; and bad men, as a rule, disregarding it, save to curse and denounce it." The very facts adduced by Robert Collyer, recently, in your columns, as to the fruits of a supreme confidence in the Bible on the part of the humble poor of England, ought forever to shield that venerable Book from sneers and jibes,—such, for example, as those indulged in recently by Denton, in his article reproduced in your columns. Surely if there was ever a time when Christians "dealt damnation round the land" with more lavish or unsparing hand than this man deals it, I should like to know when. And Mr. Towne might be safely reckoned in the same category. One would suppose that the latter gentleman believed in the existence of a certain very hot place after all, notwithstanding his declarations to the contrary, in consideration of his confession that his fierce invectives were heated, even to their white-heat, in some other furnace (some supernal?) than his own bosom.

Finally, I am opposed to cant, to hypocrisy, to dogmatism, to bitterness, to misrepresentation, to fierce rivalries of creed everywhere. But do these same offences appear any more correct on the lips or in the conduct of Free Religionists than of the stoutest Orthodox sinner or saint in the world?

R. H. HOWARD.

[It is with the utmost willingness that we give a place in our columns to the above temperate and manly protest against supposed injustice; and we respect the feelings that prompted its author to send it. If we have really erred, or misrepresented Orthodoxy, we are sincerely sorry.

But the only part of the above letter that has any bearing upon the article it criticises is the dozen lines beginning—"If a man really feels," etc. In "deploring the teaching which has borne such fruit," i. e., extravagant self-depreciation before God, Mr. Howard deploras the teachings of Orthodoxy, and joins in our condemnation of it. What censure, then, can he pass upon us?

Will Mr. Howard give a frank, direct answer to these questions?—

1. Is not the doctrine of Total Depravity an essential part of Orthodoxy?
2. Is it not the necessary effect of belief in that doctrine to create utter self-abhorrence and self-contempt?
3. Does not this loss of self-respect necessarily tend to "paralyze every influence that would make men manly, courageous, truthful, free?"

An answer to these questions, if sent, shall be printed with the least possible delay.—ED.]

"RADICAL CHRISTIANITY."

In an editorial article in the first number of his Examiner, headed "A Criticism of our Aim," Mr. Towne says:—"Our position is, that we and all others should, by radical reform, strip off what is not true religion, and make each for his own people a true Judaism, or true Christianity," etc., and then goes on to argue that each should keep what he terms their "providential name." I would ask Mr. Towne if what was left after stripping off all the errors and superstitions of the several religions would not be very nearly the same in every case. If so, why not find some one name that will express the good and true in all and call them by that, instead of having a dozen different names? It would certainly make things clearer to the common mind.

He thinks Mr. Abbot and his friends are forming a new sect, because they stand "squarely outside of Christianity," and must therefore necessarily stand outside of all other religions. Mr. Towne finds no difficulty in making a very nice distinction between "Christian religion" and "the Christian religion" in his own case; can he not see that there is a much plainer distinction between "religion" and "the religions" in the case of his friends?

If he is trying to make Christianity mean Free Religion, as he says he is, why not call it Free Religion, and not insist upon calling it Christianity, when in order to do so he must take away from the word its original meaning, and the one which it has kept eighteen hundred years?

The use of the words "American" and "Christian," which Mr. Towne quotes as a parallel case, is not so. "American" has always been used to express nationality, not justice or injustice. Mr. Parker wished to add a new meaning—"the love of justice"—to the word, not to change the old meaning. Christian has always meant a believer in the Messiahship of Christ; the new meaning—"love to God and man"—has already been added. Mr. Phillips found fault with the additional meaning of the word American; we do not quarrel with it in either case. But if Mr. Parker had said that "American" did not mean nationality at all, but only love of justice, we should think him just as wide of the mark as those who say "Christian" does not mean a belief in the Messiahship of Christ, but only love to God and man.

Knowing the strength and purity of Mr. Towne's convictions, and admiring the earnestness with which he works in their behalf, we can only regret that he cannot see what seems to us so plain.

A READER OF "THE EXAMINER."

A CRITICISM

OF "THE JESUS OF HISTORY," PUBLISHED BY WILLIAMS & NORGATE, LONDON, 1869.

This book is rather analytical than constructive. Although English in its authorship, it is German in its scholarship and treatment of the subject; which is more scholastic than original. Its great defect is that it rather obscures than discloses the idea—which should have been most prominent—that Jesus was not an exceptional personage. This is the great fact which all the orthodox writers endeavor to obliterate, and which the rationalistic ones, even, are unable to comprehend, or are afraid to encounter. As soon as this fact is understood in its full significance, and the class of persons to which he belonged, identified, then a rational life of Jesus may be written that will fill a place at present unoccupied in literature. This identification is not at all difficult. Jesus was—the word has an invidious modern sense, which did not anciently belong to it—a Demagogue: a prosecutor before the people of the upper orders of society for their vices, hypocrisies, oppressions or cupidities as rulers and magistrates. He was, like others of his age, and like some of all ages, a reformer. The basis of his reformatory efforts was the dominant popular idea of his time: a rectification of the morals of the Jewish people as a condition precedent to the restoration of the Jewish national autonomy. He felt that, although the desire for such restoration was universal, there were many who were unwilling to incur the sacrifices essential to its attainment, and these he denounced. The nature of the case would determine the style of exhortation. "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand," in the sense of reform, that we may recover our lost nationality, was doubtless the text and the sum of his discourses. It is idle to look upon the New Testament as, in any sense, an historical work. The only way to eliminate its historical errors is to do—as Strauss has done—eliminate the whole. It is through personal analogies, and a comprehension of the genius of the people and the ideas of the time, that a conception of the character and consequent conduct of Jesus can be attained. He was a Jew and deeply felt the national humiliation. He belonged to a social order with whom privation was habitual. He was a patriot willing to make large sacrifices for the sake of the end which he desired.

He was an enthusiast, a class of people prone to self-deception. He was probably imbued with the prevalent Messianic superstition, and believed that, through a process of moral purification, the Jewish nationality might be supernaturally restored. He was earnest as men are who are sure of their idea. He was doubtless eloquent, with unusual powers of homely but vivid illustration. The process through which his mode of life, his failures and his successes, reacted upon himself to work changes in his character, to transform him from an exhorter into an agitator, and from an agitator into an insurrectionist, filling his fancy with illusions, and inspiring him with an ambition that was foreign to his earlier career, is one which many others have experienced. All along the path of humanity heroes of this order have been dropped; the life of each of whom is in some sort, an illustration of that of all others. This is what I mean by a biography of Jesus from a strictly human point of view.

ORGANIZATION.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—In travelling over the country, one is astonished to see how wide-spread and simultaneous is the feeling of dissent from the popular churches and their religions. Spiritualism was the first to make inroads upon the ecclesiastical organizations. It began with the Universalists, and has nearly eviscerated that body. Then it attacked the Methodists, and thousands left its communion openly, while thousands more remained behind, deeming it best, from motives of policy, business and social, not to break their church connection. Then in "Gates Ajar" Spiritualism threw out its skirmish line, and "felt" the enemy in the orthodox churches. The success of that book, which has no uncommon merits, literary or otherwise, proves that in the conservative sects there is a remarkable readiness to accept the Spiritual philosophy. And no wonder; for who that is conscious of the dignity of his own nature does not feel an overwhelming interest in the question—if a man dies, shall he live again? The astonishing success of Spiritualism is due, I think, to the fact that it undertakes to solve this great question, and to give the tendrils of hope a solid column to twine around.

Then came Free Religion into the arena, and, denying the correctness of the popular theology, did justice to God's grand system of Natural Religion. It permeates our literature. It captivates intellect and moral worth everywhere, and would make a clean sweep of it but for the fact that it has no honors and emoluments to offer its converts, and because men in the ministry over fifty-five years of age, as a general rule, have adopted the saying—the church supports me and I must support the church.

All Spiritualists are Free Religionists, but all Free Religionists do not see their way clear to be Spiritualists. Yet, I see no reason why the two classes could not unite upon a distinctly defined platform, disavowing all creeds, and only proposing to combine their forces in the work of getting and doing good. There are many persons who, seeing the mischief done by creeds and churches, are opposed to organization, fearing that sooner or later a test of membership might be adopted which would encroach upon the sacred liberty of the individual and ultimate in bondage. There are at least a million of men and women in this country of the highest intelligence, and the loftiest moral purity, who totally and heartily repudiate the religion of the churches, but who are isolated, unacquainted with each other, and whose influence is therefore comparatively unfelt. Frequent conventions should bring these people together, that they may look each other in the face, and confer about a plan for the emancipation of other minds from the terrible yoke of superstition from which they themselves have been delivered.

Look at the advantages of organizing a sentiment; and take the church for example. The church, Protestant and especially Catholic, is organized as completely as the Prussian army. She understands the method and the policy well. As a glass lens combines and concentrates the rays of light, and brings them to a focus, and thus produces heat, so organization concentrates the separate influence of individuals, and gives them greater power.

1. There are her Theological Seminaries, which, like a nation's military academies, train up officers to command the sacramental host and to be consecrated for life to the service of re-asserting and perpetuating the dogmas and ceremonies of the church.

2. Then there are her Educational Societies, which take "poor but pious" young men from the shop, or the plough-tail, and send them to the Academy, the College, and the Seminary, to be educated for the ministry at the expense of the church. Ten years ago the statistics of the orthodox churches showed that two-thirds of the existing ministry were charity men, under pecuniary obligation to believe and preach the doctrines of the church. If one of these beneficiaries, either at the Seminary, or afterwards in the ministry, dared to think and question the creed, he was soon brought to his milk by reproaches which cut to the bone—ingratitude to his mother, the church—the frozen viper stinging the bosom of her who had warmed him into life. In 1850 an orthodox minister who lived next door to an abolitionist, was offered an anti-slavery document to read. He declined it, saying, "My friend, I don't dare to read it; for if I do, I shall be convinced that slavery is wrong, and that I ought to leave the church which upholds and justifies it. If I were able to pay back the money I received in getting an education, I would do so, and become free to think, to speak, and to act. But I am not able to do so, and I don't want to make myself unhappy, as I would, if I read that book, and became an abolitionist." That man was emasculated. He became a moral enunch for the church's sake and his own, and his long degradation impressed the very features of his face.

3. The church has her Revival Meetings; and every winter each evangelical meeting-house becomes a recruiting office to enlist soldiers of the cross. I know Methodist churches where, every night during the whole winter, meetings are kept going, and every method is resorted to to enlist recruits.

4. Then there are the Sabbath Day's services, which are the drill days of the church; Sabbath Schools for the children, and Bible classes for the adults. What a mighty influence these exert in keeping the people together, perpetuating their blindness, and making them contented in their bondage!

5. Then Baptism and the Lord's Supper, the Sacraments which furnish frequent occasions for making and renewing vows—oaths of consecration to the service of the church. A cynic once said, "The people like to be humbugged." It really seems to be the case in matters of religion, for with what holy horror does a man, just from "the table of the Lord," or "the waters of Baptism," behold the person who regards these ceremonial as empty and unmeaning!

6. Then there are Boards of Missions, for supporting weak churches everywhere, and establishing new ones. It is amazing to see, in reading the annual Reports, the large number of "weak churches," and the number of those that totally expire every year. The first class would soon follow the second, were it not for funds which the Mission Boards supply in eking out the miserable salaries of their preachers. Some time since there was great rejoicing in the orthodox camp when Mr. Connor's church in Boston, and Mr. Johnson's in Salem, disbanded. But what are these to the scores of churches among the orthodox which die without public notice, and the scores of those which linger out a feeble existence?

7. Then there are Publication Societies, and Tract Societies, for making and spreading sectarian literature, and expending in this line vast sums of money.

8. Then there are Church Extension Boards, for building meeting houses for weak churches; and departments of Agencies to raise funds for keeping the wheels of all this vast church machinery greased, and the steam up.

Thus the popular religion, like a great citadel, is buttressed up with props at the north side, props at the east side, props at the south side, and also at the west side, till it looks like the various points of the compass.

Now is it any wonder that with such a complete organization, and with such resources of men and money, and animated with the zeal of saving souls from burning in a lake of fire and brimstone, and with so many nice cozy sinecures for the leaders themselves, and their friends, in close co operation; is it strange, I say, that the church should gain adherents and command influence? My wonder is, when I think of it, that she has not taken full possession of the country, and ridden down every other thing, as she did in the middle ages. This fact can only be accounted for by a secret distrust in her doctrines that makes the intelligent luke-warm, and that quenches in a measure the zeal of those who seldom read or think, and therefore never doubt.

And yet what trepidation,—what marching and counter-marching on the battlements, and what beating of drums, when a baker's dozen of unorganized Free Religionists train a siege gun on this Malakoff of superstition, and give it a shell or two! What rejoicing there was when the "Radical," after firing hot shot for a few years, withdrew for more ammunition, and to change its position of attack!

Suppose now that the Free Religionists and Spiritualists, the advocates of Natural Religion, would unite, establish clubs in every town and neighborhood, organize a Publication Society for issuing tracts, calling in question the claims of the church as the teacher of the people, inculcating the absolute religion of love to God and love to man, opening an aggressive, reformatory policy in regard to the vices of society, and co-operating in works of beneficence,—such an organization, extending its affiliations into every town and city, would rout the church on every field of battle. Indeed there would not be much need of battle; for the church faith is so vulnerable at every point, and the doctrines of Natural Religion so consonant with reason and common sense, that all that is necessary is to adopt the didactic method of Lord Bacon, and say,—the Free Religionists think thus and so for such reasons.

What a pity it is, Mr. Abbot, that there is so much talent all over the country wasted in selfish isolation! If the principles of Radicalism by their own sheer force, and without any concert of action on the part of those who hold them, can so shake the strong-holds of superstition, what could they not do, if they were marshalled in battle array, and made war according to rule?

A DEBATE OUT WEST.

STANTON, KANSAS, NOV. 28, 1870.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—Having seen a few numbers of THE INDEX, and appreciating its worth, I now make myself a subscriber. I send, also, some names, to whom I wish you to send a sample number, hoping that, when they see it, they will also subscribe.

It may be interesting to you to know something of a debate which has just closed in this place between Joel Moody, a Free Religionist, and Rev. Pardee

Butler, a Christian. There were three Biblical questions discussed, but the following appeared to be the chief one,—“The narratives of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and the Acts of the Apostles give a correct account of the birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension to heaven of the Lord Jesus Christ, and are to be received as true.”

Under this, the essential doctrines of Christianity were discussed before a large audience for five nights; and such an array of facts bearing on it never before was presented to this people. This community, if I do say it, is above the average for intelligence and moral conduct; and, if an appreciative audience can be found, the disputants had it here.

The Christians sent into the northern part of the State for their champion, Mr. Butler, upon whom they vied with each other in bestowing praise; some even said he was the smartest man in the world, a sort of demi-god, whom they seemed to worship. Mr. Moody, however, came without any such prestige.

Mr. B. proved himself nothing but an exhorter, not a debater, and wonderfully deficient in the history of his religion. Mr. Moody, on the other hand, in his manly, forcible, logical method, weaving into his speeches a woof of history, drew even from his opponents the most flattering eulogies. It astonished the Christians, however, when Mr. Moody said that Christianity was not good enough for him, that it was not in keeping with the spirit of this age, and that the distinctive doctrines of Christianity made men and women worse instead of better. His argument on this was spiced with many facts in point, by which he portrayed the Biblical conception of God and hell as unworthy of civilized man.

The phrases—"Ascension to heaven"—and—"Lord of the universe"—he sent to their long home in the minds of nearly everybody in a fifteen-minutes' speech on Astronomy.

This debate has been a harvest of truth for hungry souls, and the good that has already come of it can be seen in the young men and women who listened. It is noticed that a freer expression is given to liberal ideas, and that the term "infidel" has lost its effect on the thinking people of the place. Above all, people are beginning to see that the Christian religion does not express the highest phase of religious life.

Yours in behalf of Truth and Manhood,

LISTENER.

THE AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE.

[The following letter, received several weeks ago, seemed to us so much to the point, that we obtained permission to print it. The writer, however, preferred not to make an anonymous criticism of a friend, and we therefore append his name. We have kept the letter in type a considerable time, hoping that Rev. Mr. Collyer would find leisure to continue his reply to Dr. Bland; but we fear that we shall be disappointed, and cannot conveniently wait longer. If Mr. Collyer's engagements permit him to complete his reply, we shall give it the earliest possible insertion in our columns.—Ed.]

I need not repeat what I have already told you, that I find THE INDEX indispensable—the freest, ablest, and most truly religious publication in the United States. The so-called religious papers are very weakly religious, but very strongly sectarian, selfish and full of cant. THE INDEX is the reverse of this, very strongly religious, and ought to be wholly without sectarianism, selfishness, or cant; and so far as I can see thus far, it is.

I want to say a word of criticism of Robert Collyer's letter in the last INDEX in reply to Dr. Bland. He says: "I had held the Bible to be of authority," because it is and has been a comfort and a consolation to men and women. This he calls his "second reason for the authority of the Bible." Children are a comfort and consolation for men and women, but they are not authority. Fire in a cold day, or a warm over-coat, water when one is thirsty, and food when hungry, are a comfort and consolation; but they are not "authority," because they are comforts and consolations. Would it not be a better use of terms and better logic to say that the Bible is a help, an indispensable help to men, if you please, rather than to call it "authority" or "of authority," because it is a comfort and consolation? The Bible, so far as it contains the hoarded experience of mankind, or the highest and best thoughts and spiritual perceptions of the race, is and must continue to be a help to all men; but not for such a reason should it be "authority" to men, or in other words their master.

If Mr. Collyer means that the Bible is of such authority as the Encyclopædia is, then we say amen; but he seems to regard it as of other and very different authority. In fact he says—"I hold it to be of authority, as a revelation of spiritual truths, above all other books." Not more valuable and richer in spiritual truths, but "of authority" above all other books." If this is what Mr. C. means, it is incumbent on him to show wherein consists, &c., and what is the nature of this authority. It seems to me that Mr. C. speaks more from his heart than he does from his head in this matter, when it is a subject upon which the heart cannot be permitted to testify. It is purely an intellectual question whether the Bible is to be regarded as authority or not; and the sentiments and emotions ought to stand aside, while it is being determined. Mr. Collyer, however, submits the whole question to the feelings, as it seems to me, and makes the term "authority" stand in the place of help, assistance, comfort, or consolation, which is sadly to confound terms.

MORE MISAPPREHENSIONS.

We have had occasion more than once in this department to correct misapprehensions concerning the Free Religious Association. We do not consider it worth while to follow up all the charges that are brought against the Association by persons who either cannot or will not understand the movement which it represents. We would especially avoid all personal controversy. But sometimes, for the sake of those who are open to conviction and are yet in doubt as to the position of the Association, and who may be led into error by the statements of unfriendly critics, it is important to make the counter-statement. For this reason we feel impelled to note two or three points of an address made by Rev. A. D. Mayo, of Cincinnati, in his church shortly after our Convention in that city. We have to trust to a report transferred to the Christian Register from the Cincinnati Gazette. It bears evidence of being authentic, and, so far as it goes, seems substantially verbatim. Yet we are willing to make allowance for reporters' mistakes.

And first, as the point that has most attracted our attention, we would like to know from Mr. Mayo, whether he or his reporter is responsible for the statement, that, "As a body, the Free Religionists are committed to the most extreme theories that prevail in relation to family life." If Mr. Mayo in this sentence has been misrepresented by his reporter, he will doubtless at once set the matter right. If the sentence is his own, we think he will see on reflection that he has been tempted into making a most unwarranted and slanderous charge. The language, to be sure, in form is somewhat ambiguous. Extremes are in two directions. Literally, the sentence might mean that the Free Religionists as a body are committed to the most strict as well as the most lax theories of family life. But we do not suppose that the writer will claim to have meant this, nor that any ordinary reader can fail to understand the insinuation that the sentence was intended to convey. Since, however, some of the prominent members of the Association have publicly taken very strict ground with regard to the family relation, and, so far as we are aware, no member, prominent or otherwise, has ever advocated "the most extreme theories that prevail" on the other side, it would be more correct to say that the Free Religionists as a body are committed to a severe than to a loose theory of family life. But in truth there is no committal of the Free Religionists as a body, or of the Association, to any theory. Individual members may commit themselves to this or that opinion, but they do not commit the Association or any other members. And certainly Mr. Mayo, if he is the Christian he professes to be, will either withdraw this charge or bring his proofs to substantiate it.

Again, Mr. Mayo characterizes (according to his reporter) the reliance of radical believers on reason and intuition, thus:—"They assume at the outset the attitude of the Deity. All knowledge is accessible only from themselves, and is only an outcome of their own souls." As to assuming the attitude of Deity, we should say that represents Orthodoxy rather than Rationalism. Rationalism assumes nothing. It is a seeker. It finds Deity through the human faculties. And we should like to know how man is to find Him in any other way. Suppose a specific Revelation: it must yet be addressed to the human faculties—must come to man through his natural powers. The natural reason, intuition, conscience must test it somewhere. We are unable to see how man is to have access to any kind of knowledge except from the plane of his own consciousness. Can he by any legerdemain step off from that plane to get it? But this is by no means to say that consciousness originates all that it contains. We do not think that Rationalists generally would accept the statement that "all knowledge is only an outcome of their own souls," but would rather say that all knowledge comes through the human soul.

One word more. Mr. Mayo appears to think that the believers in free religion are very arrogant, and that they inevitably tend to the deification of individual human reason. To our mind, on the contrary, their faith seems a very humble one. They do not claim, as Mr. Mayo does, that the world has had as yet a "perfect" system of religion; an "ultimate" statement of faith; a "complete" revelation, to which nothing can be added and from which nothing subtracted; a special teacher and life that are "a sufficient guidance to all men, in all time." They are not so audacious as to claim that their faculties have the right to say of any system of religion, that this is the completely rounded, ultimate, absolute whole; nor to assert what will be a sufficient guidance to all possible races of men in all possible ages of the future. They do believe very much in reason and intuition; they believe that man may be reverently proud of his faculties and of his position in the world; but to make such a claim as is stated above is a deification of human intellect to which they have not yet aspired.

Rev. Mr. Blanchard, of Indianapolis, as the following letter indicates, though criticising the Association, has a more generous appreciation of its position and work than has his Cincinnati brother. We reprint this letter also from the Christian Register. And we are glad of this opportunity to say, that the Association is much indebted to the hospitable and magnanimous conduct of Mr. Blanchard for the success of its Convention at Indianapolis.

INDIANAPOLIS, NOV. 6, 1870.

The Free Religious Association held a Convention in this city on Thursday evening, and Friday evening, of this week. The two evening sessions were largely attended; the two day ones brought out only small audiences. Invited by the committee having charge of the preliminary arrangements to act as temporary chairman, it seemed to me my plain duty, as minister of the Unitarian society, to accept the invitation.

tation. The Liberal Christian should co-work, as far as he can, with the Free Religionist. Liberal Christianity is Free Religion plus the leadership of Jesus Christ.

I attended the meetings, listened with interest to the speeches, enjoyed much and regretted much.

The addresses of the President, Rev. O. B. Frothingham, were admirable in spirit and excellent in statement. Mr. Towne showed his deep religious fervor, and also his readiness "to strike very hard." Mr. Abbot exhibited sweetness of spirit in many of his remarks, great earnestness of purpose, and great readiness to get his ideas lodged in his hearers' minds by preparatory "shocking." He seems desirous of storming through the breach instead of swinging open the gates. Mr. Potter won attention by his gentle speech. Mr. Connor, Mr. Vickers, and Miss Peckham also made addresses, and a paper was read by Col. J. O. Martin, of this city. Several Catholic priests and three or four of the "evangelical" clergy were present, and the audiences were attentive, though somewhat sparing of their applause.

While there was much in this Convention which Liberal Christians will disapprove, there was also much which should receive their approbation. The earnest spirit which has sent these men out on their present convention tour, and which will impel them to seek a hearing in many places, is one to command respect. Their scholarship is unquestionable, and their ability to reach the people evident. Let us give them, therefore, our regards as gentlemen, as scholars, and as apostles of Free Religion.

From their Convention there is a lesson to be drawn which we Liberal Christians will do well to heed. We too must have conventions. We too must send out our speakers, by threes or fours, to utter their best words in our towns and cities, where Unitarian societies already exist and where they do not. Many persons will attend conventions who will not enter our churches or our halls on Sundays. The clergy of the Orthodox bodies will attend them. The Romish priests will listen to them. Believing mightily in Liberal Christianity, I yearn to see our denomination inaugurate the convention system. Let our best men be fired by a missionary zeal. Equipped by learning, reading, zeal and gifts of speech, let them summon the people to hear them. We must meet the issues presented by our brothers, the Free Religionists. Christianity and culture must go together. Liberal Christianity, interpreted by Martineau and Hedge, Freeman Clarke and Charles Lowe, can enter the arena with Free Religion.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING's Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

According to the Watchman and Reflector, the following are given in a recently published work on English surnames as specimens of the old Puritans in England about the year 1658. They are taken from a jury list in Sussex county, and cannot fail to cause a smile in our day: Faint-not Hewet, Seek-wisdom Wood, Redeemed Compton, Accepted Trevor, God-reward Smart, Make-peace Heaton, Be-courteous Cole, Repentance Ains, Return Spelman, Kill-sin Pimple, Fly-debate Roberts, Be-faithful Sinner, Hope-for Rending, Weep-not Billings, Elected Mitchell, Fight-the-good-fight-of-faith White, Stand-fast-on-high Stringer, Search-the-Scriptures Morton, The-peace-of-God Knight.

VOLTAIRE'S DEATH.—While in his last illness the clergy had come round him; and as all philosophers of that period appear to have felt particularly anxious that no public stigma should be cast upon them by a refusal of Christian burial, they persuaded him to undergo confession and absolution. He had a few weeks before submitted to this ceremony, and professed to die in the Catholic faith, in which he was born—a ceremony which M. Condorcet may well say gave less edification to the devout than it did scandal to the Freethinkers. The cure (rector) of St. Sulpice had, on this being related, made inquiry, and found the formula too genteel. He required the Abbe Gauthier, who had performed the office, to insist upon a more detailed profession of faith, else he should withhold the burial certificate. While this dispute was going on, the dying man recovered and put an end to it.

On what proved his real death-bed, the cure came and insisted on a full confession. When the dying man had gone a certain length, he was required to subscribe to the doctrine of our Savior's divinity. This roused his indignation, and he gave vent to an exclamation which at once put to flight all the doubts of the pious and reconciled the Infidels to their patriarch. The certificate was refused, and he was buried in a somewhat clandestine, certainly hasty manner, at the monastery of Scellieres, of which his nephew was abbot. The bishop of the diocese (Troyes) hearing of the abbe's intention, dispatched a positive prohibition; but it arrived the day after the ceremony had taken place.—From Lord Brougham's "Lives of Men of Letters and Science."

LADY MEDICAL STUDENTS IN CINCINNATI.—One of our lady M. D.'s is attending clinical lectures at the Cincinnati Hospital, and is received on the same footing as the gentlemen. The first morning she attended there was a perfect silence and utter surprise on the part of the male students. Next morning they hissed her, and she paid no attention. On her entrance the next morning they hissed more vehemently; presently the professors came in and treated her with such marked respect it struck the young men that she had a right to be there, or that the professors thought so at any rate. Next morning there was a slight attempt at hissing, but cries of "Stop that," "Quit that," "None of that," from various quarters, soon silenced the few whose manhood was not sufficient for the trial of giving a woman an equal chance with themselves, and since then the lady has been so respectfully treated that it reflects credit on the Cincinnati students, as compared with those of Philadelphia and New York.—Cincinnati Commercial.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, truly,

GEO. SHARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

Yours, truly,

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

Yours, truly,

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for Children

Teething greatly facilitates the process of teething, by softening the gums, reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain and spasmodic action, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants.

We have put up and sold this article nearly thirty years, and CAN SAY IN CONFIDENCE AND TRUTH of it what we have never been able to say of any other medicine—NEVER HAS IT FAILED IN A SINGLE INSTANCE TO EFFECT A CURE, when timely used. Never did we know an instance of dissatisfaction by any one who used it. On the contrary, all are delighted with its operations, and speak in terms of commendation of its magical effects and medical virtues. We speak in this matter "WHAT WE DO KNOW," after years of experience, AND PLEDGE OUR REPUTATION FOR THE FULFILLMENT OF WHAT WE HERE DECLARE. In almost every instance where the infant is suffering from pain or exhaustion, relief will be found in fifteen or twenty minutes after the syrup is administered.

Full directions for using will accompany each bottle. Be sure to call for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," having the fac-simile of "CURTIS & PERKINS" on the outside wrapper. All others are base imitations.

TOLEDO, . . . OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE FUTURE OF RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION, AS AFFECTED BY THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

[An Address reprinted from the Report of the Third Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston, May 27, 1870.]

MR. PRESIDENT,—In assigning to me, as the special topic of my remarks this morning, "The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age," you have summoned me to a task very perilous to the reputation of any one who ventures to attempt it: I mean the task of prophecy. Certainly I make no pretension to the inspiration which is supposed to be the prophet's peculiar qualification for his work. But remembering that the "scientific study of theology" is one of the specified objects of this Association, and remembering also that the great apostle of the Positive Philosophy declares it to be an "axiom" that "science has prevision for its object," I will venture to peer into the future by the light of certain great principles or ideas. It is the power of these principles or ideas over the human mind which has produced what is called the "Spirit of the Age;" and if I can detect the tendencies they are creating, as active causes in the great religious upheaval of modern times, I think I shall have done my duty to you and to the audience. If I fail to win a great reputation as a prophet, I shall console myself with the reflection that I had, at least, no such reputation to lose.

In America, where society is, as it were, in solution, and where men and women are at liberty to obey natural laws of aggregation, uncramped by the restrictions of an ancient and hardened social system, the solvent power of ideas over imported trans-Atlantic institutions is enormous. The laws of social crystallography manifest themselves visibly in the voluntary arrangements and re-arrangements of men in the mass. If any thing is clear to an observant eye, it is that the most important changes are taking place in all our social relations. All institutions in America are changing, and we are all asking ourselves, "What will come out of this universal ferment and effervescence?" Especially in religious organizations we see conflicting agencies at work: every sect has its two parties, progressive and reactionary; and many persons are dismayed at the possible results of their antagonism. For myself, whether wisely or unwisely, I believe that I see the general meaning of the marches and counter-marches, the noise and bustle and battle, which are all about us in this age. I believe that the Church, the great organization of Christianity, is going to pieces, as surely as a ship driven upon a rocky coast; and I believe that some organization of Free Religion is going to take its place. The peculiar ideas of Christianity are growing obsolete to this generation; its peculiar objects are becoming more and more uninteresting, even offensive, to it; its peculiar methods appear more plainly to be out of harmony with the spirit of the modern world. But at the same time I believe that never, in the whole history of man, was religion so much thought about as to-day. I am more and more impressed with the intense earnestness which underlies the commercial and industrial activity of the times. Because vast numbers of people take seemingly no interest in the churches, Christians shake their heads dolefully over the godlessness of the world, stigmatize the century as one of unbelief, and sigh for the "ages of faith" when all Christendom was of one mind. All this seems to me a libel on the times in which we live. "When the Son of Man cometh," said Jesus, "shall he find faith in the earth?" If he should come to-day, he would find more faith than ever, though not of the kind he meant. The very want of faith which is so lamented is proof of the faith in which I rejoice. Faith in man, faith in ideas, faith in the natural laws which are the "higher thoughts and higher ways" of the God I believe in, were never so intense as to-day. Why, it is this faith, and this faith alone, which has made America possible; and when you talk to me about the "faithlessness" of the age, its scepticism, its materialism, its devotion to secular prosperity, its indifference to your long, dry, chaffy sermons, I reply, "Thank God, that the world has come out of your tombs of churches, and now sits clothed, in its right mind." All this indicates that life at last flows in its natural channels; that men in this life busy themselves about the things of this life, as they ought. When a higher life comes, as I indeed trust it will come, it will be time enough to attend to the things of that life. Before heaven above, heaven below. The world is right, and the Church is wrong. Nature is wiser than the doctors who do their best to make her sick. They are prescribing for all sorts of fever, when the only disease of the patient is rapid growth and exuberant health.

I said that the Christian Church was going to pieces. I believe it, chiefly for the following reasons.

1. Because the Church is growing more liberal. This is a symptom which nine radicals in ten take to be a sign ahat the Church is entering on a new lease of life. But it is a sign that the Church is dying. The conservatives are wholly right in this matter; and the radicals will see it, when they come to take an outside view of Christianity. The Roman Catholic Church of the Middle Ages was Christianity ruling the world. When liberty got one foot into its stronghold at the Reformation, its power was shaken; when she gets her whole body inside, its power will be gone. Just in proportion as liberty of thought and liberality of feeling get into the Church, in that same proportion Christianity gets out of it. Christian freedom is Christian disintegration. The reason is that every organization must have its fundamental law; and the fundamental law of Christianity is submission to authority. In every sect, the radical wing is for larger liberty,—and rightly, for liberty is the birthright of man; but the conservative wing is for authority,—and rightly, for authority is the very essence of Christianity. Both are right, for each is faithful to its own idea; and the reason why they don't agree is because their ideas are antagonistic. Liberty and Christianity never have been reconciled, and never will be reconciled; and from the moment that liberty began to get into the Christian Church, the Church was doomed. Its fall is only a question of time. When a Christian minister begins to say bold and radical things, like Mr. Murray at Park Street yonder, who is it that applauds, the Christian public or the outside public? The former are disturbed and terrified: it is the latter who are pleased. Do you suppose this quick and unerring instinct means nothing? The people don't reason on the matter; but they have an intuitive perception of the practical relations of things, and see tendencies quicker than arguments. Radicals would be wiser if they appreciated this fact. I say it, and say it with emphasis,—the rapidly increasing liberality of the Christian Church is its rapidly approaching dissolution. Give liberty its will, and the walls will all tumble level with the ground. The Catholics, the Protestant Evangelicals, the Unitarians and Universalists, being all more or less infected with the spirit of age (which is simply the spirit of freedom), are all travelling the broad road of destruction, as Christian bodies. But—and this is why I rejoice—they will only arrive all the sooner as individuals at manhood and womanhood.

2. Another reason why I believe the Church is going to pieces is that it is growing more united. This, again, is taken commonly as a sign of strength; but it is, under present circumstances, really a sign of weakness,—an alarmed huddling together to resist a common foe. If the influence of free thought both inside and outside the sects were not so evidently on the increase, you would see no such desperate amalgamations as that of Old and New School Presbyterianism, possible only by the sacrifice of what once were deep convictions. The marked tendencies to union among the Evangelical bodies of the country are due partly to a growing indifference to Christian doctrines, partly to a growing spirit of fellowship which, by a noble inconsistency, forgets the doctrines, partly to a secret and well-grounded alarm at the spread of so-called "infidelity." All these are signs of weakness. The rotting-away of theological fences, the consequent over-stepping of the fences, and alarm lest the fences prove inadequate for protection,—that is the real meaning of these phenomena of concentration. The fences once meant strong convictions, earnest and powerful beliefs worth battling for; now they are held so languidly that the trouble and sacrifices of war are too burdensome, and the congregations go for "peace at any price." The instinct of fellowship has been powerfully repressed by doctrines; as, for instance, by the "close communion" doctrine of the "regular" or "Calvin Baptists." But this doctrine, which is the strict logical corollary from Baptist premises, became so weakened in its hold on the minds of the people, that a new sect of "Free-will Baptists" split off by themselves, under the influence of the spirit of the age, to realize a wider fellowship. New sects always start with powerful and earnest convictions; and re-union always remains impossible while this earnestness and strength endure. The centripetal forces which to-day are drawing the Evangelical sects together, and which are overbalancing the centrifugal forces of independent beliefs, furnish daily proofs of the decay of Christian tenets. Indifference to doctrine is weakness, easy-going and illogical good-fellowship is weakness, fear of infidelity is weakness,—that is, if judged from the stand-point of the Christian Church; and these weaknesses, which are the causes of the tendency to union among the sects, prove inherent weakness in the Church itself.

One other reason only will I mention why I believe the Church is going to pieces: it is seeking to ally itself with the State. I refer to the attempts, laughed at thus far by the country, to get the Church established by law, through a theological amendment to the Constitution. The project seems ridiculous enough, yet it is the drowning man's clutch at a straw. When such men as Dr. Cheever and Professor Tayler Lewis virtually advocate the absurd scheme in the "New York Independent," the significance of the movement becomes more than trivial; and the late Pittsburg Convention, though empty as a bubble, is a bubble that shows the drift of the current. What but conscious weakness and alarm could prompt such a violation of Puritan principles? Is it not plainly a retrogression to Catholic ground?

And what could cause this retreat to the Church-and-State theory of Rome, except the fear produced by the formidable spread of free thought? Nothing short of deadly peril to the Church would ever reconcile American Christians to it. Yet we shall hear more, and not less, of this wild, despotic project. The instinct of self-preservation is strong in all organized bodies; and, reason being on the side of free-thought, Christianity must rely on law. Even the Unitarians, professedly the friends of freedom, know well how to make the law eke out the deficiency of their arguments.

Believing, therefore, that the Christian Church is going to pieces, I inquire whether its fate is to be that of all religious organization. Let us look at a few facts of human nature, from which, I think, an answer may be drawn.

1. If, as I conceive (notwithstanding Mr. Wasson's recent able essay in the "Radical"), the essence of religion is man's effort to perfect himself in all directions,—that is, to develop all the ideal possibilities of his nature,—then it may with truth be said that man is naturally a religious being. The gradual but unending progress of the race from lower to higher levels is the most wonderful phenomenon of history; yet this social progress is only the sum total, the generalized result, of individual efforts to achieve perfection of being. The existence of this great law of human progress is to my own mind the most convincing proof of infinite intelligence and moral purpose in universal nature. The first great fact to be noted, therefore, is that man is naturally a religious being.

2. But it is also true that man is naturally a social being. The same instinct which makes beavers club together to build a dam makes men associate whenever they have any common objects to accomplish. Common ideas, common aspirations, common aims, create at once a yearning and a basis of fellowship. We are drawn man to man, by forces sacred and omnipotent. Every pure emotion and high thought and noble purpose seeks to see itself multiplied in many souls.

"As the deep sea reflects the sky,
As in a glass forms re-appear,
So in some heart would I descry
The image of my hope and fear."

The universal fellowship of humanity, for which every lofty spirit longs today with an earnestness hitherto unknown in the world's history, is simply a less intense but more diffused friendship,—a recognition of the law of love as the true substitute for soldiers and police-officers in the maintenance of social order. The social instinct will find its perfect development in nothing short of the Brotherhood of Man.

3. These two co-equal facts, that man is both a religious and a social being, are the cause of a third fact; namely, religious organization. That religion will always be organized, in some form or other, may, I think, be set down as a truth beyond dispute. So long as human nature remains what it is, it will create religions as surely as industrial, commercial, or political institutions. In other words, I believe that religious organization has a future; and my subject is not a bootless one.

4. But while these permanent facts of man's religious and social nature insure the permanence of religious organization, in some form or other, it is a fourth fact, quite as sure, that its special forms are all changeable and transient. I deny the possibility of any changeless or permanent form of organized religion. The reason is obvious. All institutions, religious or otherwise, are moulded by wants, circumstances, and opinions, which are constantly changing. Changes of public opinion on other subjects react with great power on men's religion, and there is no reason to suppose that changes in public opinion will ever cease to occur. It is safe to say, therefore, that the organizations founded by religion in one age will be changed in form by the ages that succeed. This, surely, is the lesson of the past; and it shows how idle are all speculations as to the "Church of the Future." What Church in Christendom, for instance, has escaped the influences of increasing civilization? If any Church could boast of immutability, it would surely be the Roman Catholic Church; yet finding his Encyclical and Syllabus powerless to arrest the growing influence of secular knowledge and progress, the poor old Pope is compelled to summon an Ecumenical Council from the four quarters of the globe, in order to strengthen the Catholic Church by the new dogma of Papal Infallibility. That is, the Catholic Church is compelled to change, in order to prove its own vaunted changelessness! If Romanism is thus obliged to change, what other form of organized religion can pretend to be unchangeable? Organization endures; but organizations shift like summer clouds. In every one of them we see a double law of permanence and change, of life and death. Metamorphosis of the indestructible is the eternal lesson of Nature.

Thus we find four great facts which are solid as granite,—that man is a religious being, that man is a social being, that consequently religion must be organized, and that religious organization must at the same time exist and change. These facts I conceive to be scientifically established.

Now when we seek to read the future, not of organized religion in general, but of some particular organized religion,—as, for instance, Christianity,—the success of our investigation will depend on our ability to discriminate between its universal and special elements. The universal element is permanent: the special element is transient. When, therefore, I say that I believe the Christian Church is going to pieces, I mean that it is perishing as a particular form of organized religion. It will partly perish and partly survive. Let me point out what I conceive as likely to last in the Christian Church, and what to pass away.

1. The great purpose of perfecting humanity, which created the Christian Church, is going to last. Humanity will never cease to lift itself up to higher levels. This is the substance of religion; and Christianity is one of the world's religions.

2. The practice of meeting together for mutual improvement, under the strong attraction of this common purpose, is going to last. The sentiment of brotherhood, the deep craving for a fellowship based on the noblest aspirations of humanity, is as eternal as the human heart, and will continue to draw men and women together in the pursuit of truth and goodness. But I greatly doubt whether the ministry, as now established, will continue. The Free Congregational Society of Florence, Northampton, has taught us all a lesson in this respect, retaining a regular speaker for part of the time, and leaving the supply of speakers for the rest of the time in the hands of a committee of their own number. This combines the advantages of the settled ministry and the lyceum system. The character of the services should be determined freely by each speaker, according to his individual convictions. But the matter of "exchanges" should not be in the hands of the regular speaker, but of the people who are to listen. They have an undoubted right to determine whom they will hear. Quite recently, I believe, the Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society of Boston has adopted the Florence plan; and I am inclined to think that this plan is a foreshadowing of the future.

3. The practice of combining the strength of individuals in a common effort to ameliorate the condition of the world is going to last. The noblest men and women will always, as now, associate to reform abuses, to alleviate wretchedness, to advance great ideas,—in a word, to better mankind. The love of man which has lent its highest beauty to the Christian Church, and inspired the Sisters of Charity and other unselfish workers of Christian history, will never grow cold in the human heart. It did not owe its origin to Christianity, and will long, very long, survive it.

These, I think, will be leading features in the organized religion of the future, as they have been in that of the past, since they do but express the very nature of religion itself. In other respects, there will be little uniformity of practice. Especially in the matter of public worship, I should hesitate to express a positive opinion. Music of some sort will naturally belong to any meetings that may grow out of religious aspiration and endeavor. But public prayer should be purely optional with him who conducts the meetings. There will most certainly be perfect freedom, both of thought, speech, and action, in the organized religion of the future: it will be most emphatically free religion. For this reason, it would be presumptuous and foolish to attempt to predict its precise forms or methods. These will take care of themselves, and utter the opinions and sentiments of the time. The organizations of the future, however, will give fit instrumentalities to the great purpose of perfecting humanity in natural ways,—will provide for social meetings for mutual help, improvement, and religious sympathy,—and will create efficient means for the practical work of philanthropy and reform.

So much as this I regard as beyond all reasonable doubt: more than this I shall not venture to predict.

So far, therefore, as the Christian Church has met these wants, it will survive. But not as the Christian Church. The special element of Christianity is rapidly perishing, and with it will perish all that gives the Christian Church its distinctive peculiarities. Under the special element I include all those beliefs, activities, and sentiments, which cluster about the person of "the Christ,"—which invest the Bible with exceptional claims on human reverence and obedience,—which represent the Church as an institution founded by God, to endure to the end of time. These sentiments, beliefs, and activities are essential to all forms of organized Christianity, and are fated to pass away. Let me state, in general, what is going to perish in the Christian Church.

1. The Christian doctrines and claims which make the corner-stone of the Church must perish. They are based on superstition alone.

2. All the ecclesiastical machinery devised to propagate these doctrines, enforce these claims, and establish the divine authority of the Christ, the Bible, and the Church, must perish.

3. The spirit of persecution, the arrogance of bigotry, the pride of orthodoxy, the conceit of holding the absolute truth, the furor of proselytism, the greed of ecclesiastical aggrandizement,—all these must perish.

4. The Christian name must perish, as wedded indissolubly to the perishing special element of Christianity. The organized religion of the future will create its own name, and raise its own universal flag.

Now to expect that the Christian Church will ever willingly consent to the relinquishment of all this, and thus commit hara-kiri, would be the height of folly. I expect no such thing. Enfeebled as it is by the increase of freedom and intelligence and civilization, the Church is still powerful and will fight to the bitter end. Those are woefully deceived who fancy that it will ever wheel into line with modern ideas. It cannot do so and live; and corporations die hard.

I am no alarmist. I hate all wars, even in self-defence. I admire the spirit which rejoices in the "sympathy of religions," and would fain ignore their antagonisms. But I see an irrepressible conflict between the Christian Church and the modern world which has got to be fought out here in America. The question of the life or death of the Christian Church will yet shake this continent to its foundations. It will get into politics,—nay, is already getting into politics. The Bible-in-schools controversy and the agitation of the theological amendment to the Constitution are but a hint of what is yet to come. I wish I could feel sure that this great conflict would be settled peacefully at the polls; but I do not feel sure of it. The moneyed institutions of the Christian Church are vast, its social influence is enormous, its slumbering power for evil is beyond all estimate. Representing nobody in this Association but myself,—nay, uttering what I know seems to most of them and to you to be the wild extravagance of theories pushed to absurd extremes,—I do nevertheless avow my own conviction that American civilization and the American government have a domestic enemy in the Christian Church to be compared only to the great slave-power of the South. What the Anti-Slavery Society did to the South, this Association is doing to the Church,—awakening and exasperating an enemy whose hand may yet be raised against the nation's life. Those who are disposed to slight the warning will do well to remember the incredulity of the North down to the very outbreak of the war. The great question of political slavery has been gloriously settled: the still greater question of spiritual slavery is looming up before us. What may lie between the present hour and the hour of final settlement, I can but dimly discern by the light of ideas; but sure I am, that freedom shall yet win her crowning triumph over the Christian Church, to be remembered with the same profound thankfulness with which we now remember the fall of the slave Confederacy.

"You can do anything if you have patience," said an old uncle, who had made a fortune, to his nephew, who had nearly spent one. "Water may be carried in a sieve, if you only wait." "How long?" asked the petulant spendthrift, who was impatient for the old man's obituary. "Till it freezes," was the cold reply.

People who travel in cannibal countries are apt to be turned into Indian meal.

SAINT AND SINNER.

[From The Israelite.]

The pernicious doctrine of making a saint of the sinner any time the latter may select or find convenient to stop his scandalous career, and then be placed ahead of the purely righteous person in the scale of moral perfection, is not merely a favorite theory with the Gospel writers, but with many other Pharisean doctors who left their imprints in Talmud, Midrash, or Epistle. St. Paul, the arch-sinner, suddenly becomes Prime Minister of the cunning Deity, who intends to give satisfaction to the opposition in his realm; and Nebuzraddon, after having slaughtered thousands of innocent beings, suddenly turns a saint.

Henry Ward Beecher, in his sermon of November 12th, as due to an orthodox Pharisean Christian, subscribes to this doctrine in the following paragraph:—

"But a Pharisee who has been building himself up by his morality, is so good, so respectable, so observant; he has so few faults and so many excellencies, that when the word of God comes to him, he does not believe that he is a sinner. It is harder, therefore, to convict such a man; and the chances of his coming into the kingdom of heaven are less than in the case of the immoral man. He thinks so well of himself that the immoral man, or the harlot, is more likely to go into God's kingdom than he is. The immoral man knows that he sins, and acknowledges it; the harlot is conscious of being a great sinner, and says of harlotry, 'It is a hideous sin;' so that, after all, they are more accessible to recuperative influences than the moralist who spends most of his time in being proper, and the rest of the time in praising himself for it."

Mr. Beecher knows not how Pharisean a Pharisee he himself is in his exegesis and dogmatism. We do not maintain that he is one of the Phariseans "who has been building himself up by his morality, is so good, so respectable, so observant," as we merely refer to his exegesis and petrified dogmatism, in which he is the Pharisee par excellence. For the sake of morality, however, he ought to get rid of the pernicious doctrine which places the sinner above the virtuous person. It is not true that the old harlot becomes as pure as the virtuous wife and mother, if she kneels away all the days of her impotent life. The things done can not be made undone. Omnipotence itself can not do it. It is not true that yonder thief and swindler, who has robbed widows and orphans and cheated the laborer out of his wages, but now lives in a mansion, in opulence and splendor, becomes a penitent, crying, weeping, howling communicant of Rev. Dr. So and So's church, is therefore as good as his honest neighbor who has not a wrong penny in his house. Morality revolts against a doctrine which debases the honest man, the virtuous woman, and exalts harlots and criminals; it revolts against the God who prefers those who have long enough enjoyed a wicked life to those who shun evil and loathe corruption. Why do you degrade God and man? Why do you idealize vice and crime at the expense of virtue, honor, and righteousness? Young people, unawares that the doctrine is a more clap-net to assuage guilty conscience and to gain new members to the church, might justly say: "Very well, if the penitent sinner stands so much higher before God in the scale of moral perfection than the habitually honest, sober, virtuous, and honorable person, then of course it is necessary in the first place to be a sinner; the more the better, in order to reach moral perfection and God's full grace. Let's go on and sow our wild oats, let's us play the devil all round, and then let's go to Mr. Beecher and become religious." This is the necessary and legitimate induction from the above doctrine.

Let none be misled by such priestly wickedness. The sinner is no saint. He may repent his wicked career and avert its evil consequences, but the time spent in wickedness is lost and gone, and none can revoke it. The vicious habits and brutal lusts contracted in a sinful life, as a revengeful punishment, adhere to the soul for many, many years, and brand it with imperfection. That is the law of nature. It is the law of God.

THE LOCATION OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.—There is a beautiful tradition in regard to the location of Solomon's Temple. The spot was owned by two brothers, of whom one had a family, the other none. The ground was sowed with wheat. One evening in harvest time, when the wheat was bound in bundles and laid in two heaps, the elder brother said to his wife, "My younger brother is not able to bear the burden and heat of the day; I will rise and take my sheaves, and without his knowing it, lay them beside his."

The younger brother, moved by the same benevolent impulse, said within himself, "My elder brother has a family, but I have not. I will contribute to his support. I will arise and without his knowledge lay my sheaves beside his."

Who can conceive their mutual astonishment, when, on the following morning, each of them found his sheaves again, as if they had not been removed! This was repeated several nights in succession, till they both resolved to watch, that the secret might be unravelled. So said, so done. The next night they met half way, each with his arms full of sheaves.

On the spot sanctified by such affection Solomon's Temple was erected,—a building so splendid and magnificent that it became one of the wonders of the world.—Translated from the German.

For every vice or virtue a man exhibits, he generally gets credit or discredit for a whole brood.

LITTLE BREECHES.

A PIKE COUNTY VIEW OF SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

I don't go much on religion,
I never hain't had no show;
But I've got a middlin' tight grip, Sir,
On the handfull o' things I know.
I don't pan out on the prospects
And free-will, and that sort of thing,
But I b'lieve in God and the angels,
Ever since one night last Spring.

I come into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe come along;
No four-year-old in the county
Could beat him for pretty and strong.
Pearl and chipper and sassy,
Always ready to swear and fight,
And I'd larnt him to chew terbacker,
Jest to keep his milk-teeth white.

The snow come down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store.
I went in for a jug of molasses
And left the team at the door.
They scared at something and started,
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we roused up some torches,
And searched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Up-sot, dead beat—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me
Of my fellow-critters' aid;
I jest flopped down on my marrow bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.

By this, the torches were played out,
And me and Isrul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheep fold
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs at night.
We looked in and saw them huddled
So warm and sleepy and white.
And thar sot Little-Breeches and chirped
As pearl as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm.
They jest scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around The Throne.

TRYING HIS TEETH.—In a small city, not far distant from the "Hub," resides a dentist named Brown. He received an order from his beloved pastor for a set of false teeth. The work was executed promptly, and the pet shepherd of his pet flock called in at the appointed time to receive them. Brown fixed them in his reverend customer's mouth, when the latter, stepping to the glass to see the effect, said slowly and distinctly:

"Jesus Christ! Jesus Christ!"

Now Brown is more noted for his quickness of temper and profanity than for his piety; and hearing his customer speak in such a manner, his ire was quickly aroused.

"Blast it!" he exclaimed, "if you don't like the teeth, you needn't take them, but there is no necessity for your swearing about it."

The astonished minister drew back.

"My dear sir," he exclaimed, "I was not swearing about the teeth; but for ten years I have not been able to pronounce my beloved Savior's name distinctly; I was only trying your teeth."

BRUTALIZING EFFECTS OF WAR.—A German soldier describes his sensations in battle as follows:

"When one has seen the dreadful wounds of many of one's comrades, one feels doubly thankful to his Creator for having escaped unscathed; and yet I confess that the second time, at Sedan, I faced the bullets even more calmly and coolly than the first time. I do not know how it is, but one wholly forgets the danger one is in, and thinks only of the effect of one's own bullets, rejoicing, like a child, at the sight of the enemy falling like skittles, and having scarcely a compassionate glance to spare for the comrade falling at one's side. One ceases to be a human being, and turns into a brute—a complete brute."

A talented young African, of the boot-black persuasion, observed a neighbor poring wisely over a newspaper, whereupon he addressed him thus: "Julius, what are you looking at dat paper for? You can't read." "Go way, fellah," cried the other indignantly; "guess I can read. I's big enuff for dat." "Big nuff," retorted the other scornfully; "dat ain't nuffin. A cow's big nuff to kotch a mice; but she can't."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"But THE INDEX will be advertised in spite of our theologians. One of the frequent speakers at the Friday meetings of Mr. ———'s church at the last weekly meeting spoke of the lecture on 'Revivals,' and I understand said it contained a good deal of truth. He made a mistake as to the place of publication; he said, 'This Chicago INDEX, which is getting so thick around here,' etc. The ——— editor informed me that he sent his copy of THE INDEX over to the Theological Library. THE INDEX has improved my health. It has a wholesome influence, and is as refreshing as a shower-bath. I commiserate the weakly constitutions that prefer warm water. While Orthodoxy looks outside of itself for authority, for peace and joy it trusts to the indwelling hope its faith gives. Free Religion looks within for authority, but beyond self for the satisfaction of the higher aspirations. The selfish man can find no comfort in Free Religion till he becomes unselfish and understands it. But for a man who is strong in faith and love, it is enough; and it should be the object of civilization to develop such men, and not weaklings. Catholicism may develop a spasmodic nation like France, but Rationalism alone can develop a powerful nation like Germany."

—"I have a brother in San Francisco who occupies an influential position, and I am anxious that he should become acquainted with your paper. It has slipped my mind to mention it when writing to him, but if you will mail him a few copies for the enclosed, I will write immediately urging his action in its favor among his liberal friends. His views have lately been somewhat engrossed with the marvels of Spiritualism; but I don't think that will blind him to the ring of the true metal as you present it. The large infusion of progressive religious thought that I found in those unaccountable communications paved my own way very considerably for the acceptance of the propositions of Free Religion in the more comfortable and common-sense form in which I now enjoy it."

—"I cannot refrain from expressing myself puzzled to think over my experience in liberalism, to see how eagerly my books and papers are read by others. They seem to entertain them, but when we ask for subscriptions we are almost invariably put off. I have bought those reports and many other small works on purpose to lend to others. I may live to see the time that I can do something substantial for the cause of humanity. But alas! I myself need a supporting hand. There is none of us but what is honestly working at the highest pitch of his means and intelligence. I rejoice in the hope that our labor is not entirely in vain."

—"Enclosed I send five cents. Please send me a copy of THE INDEX. I have been hunting around for some time to find something sensible and reasonable."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The Society will meet next Sunday Evening, December 18, in the hall in Daniels' Block, corner Summit and Jefferson Sts., at 7½ o'clock.

RADICAL CLUB.—Meeting immediately after that of the Independent Society. Subject as previously announced.

EVENING SCHOOL FOR MEN AND BOYS.—This School will be re-opened at 7 o'clock Wednesday Evening, Dec. 14, in Daniels' Block, corner of Summit and Jefferson Streets.

EVENING SCHOOL FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS.—A free Evening School for women and girls, similar to that for men and boys, will be opened at 7 o'clock, Friday Evening, Dec. 16, in Campbell's Block, corner of Jefferson and St. Clair Streets. If required, two other such Schools will be opened in different parts of the city.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our back numbers is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

CORNELL AND CHRISTIANITY.

On the next page will be found an article by Prof. William C. Russel, one of the most respected members of the Faculty of Cornell University, kindly but vigorously defending that institution from a supposed attack on our part in the essay read before the late Free Religious Conventions. For this frank and manly article we tender him our sincerest thanks, and would state at the outset that, if what we have to say seems to him to require further correction, or in any degree to fail of exact truth, we not only invite, but request as a favor, a further prosecution of the subject. All we intend, at least, is a fair and accurate representation of facts as they are.

In the first place, we meant to attack, not Cornell University, but the great, organized superstition which is the University's worst and most dangerous enemy. What we said of Cornell was only by way of illustration; and we included all American universities under the same statement. Our specifying Cornell in particular, after mentioning Harvard and Yale and the University of Michigan, was a compliment to it,—our point being that even the most liberal university in America was hampered and injured by public superstition, which rendered impossible the complete fulfilment of the liberal professions made at its foundation.

We cannot wonder that a professor of Cornell University, full of a noble enthusiasm for its great future and present usefulness, should thus misconceive the spirit of our allusion to it; but it is a misconception which, in justice both to the University and to ourself, we cannot let go uncorrected. We are not a whit behind him in our admiration for what Cornell has already accomplished, or in our hope for its still greater achievements hereafter. It seems ungracious, perhaps even churlish, to criticise it in any respect when its friends are battling so stoutly against a host of ecclesiastical bigots, or to add to the fire from the front a seeming fire from the rear. But it is our painful duty to hold up to this generation an ideal of freedom so strict and high, that it rebukes us all. Not merely the friends of Cornell, but many of our own co-workers for Free Religion, have shown symptoms of annoyance at our work; and we are quite human enough to feel pained thereby. But ought we therefore to flee a task which we believe sorely needs to be done, and which we find nobody else doing? No! This generation is blind to the stern fact that Christianity is a great system of faith which, by the very law of its being, puts fetters on the free mind of man, and has therefore become the greatest obstruction to the progress of science, republicanism, and civilization,—nay, religion itself. The world is asleep—it needs to be awakened. Cost what it may to our friends or to ourself, we are under bonds to our own conscience to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in this matter. We would speak with the utmost modesty and with absolute kindness; but speak we must—and shall.

Now what attitude toward Christianity should be held by a university truly devoted to free education? Briefly, that of ABSOLUTE INDEPENDENCE. Such a university should have no more connection with the church than has (or should have) the State. It should teach no theological doctrines and support no religious worship; it should leave these, as the State should also, to the private consciences or voluntary combinations of individuals. Nor should it pay the slightest heed to the ultimate effects of its instructions upon the organized religion of the land. If science leads to atheism, none the less ought it to teach science. And if, in obedience to the scientific spirit and in the scientific prosecution of his special department of study, any professor should find it incumbent upon him to point out the good and evil influences of Christianity (and this might well happen to a professor of philosophy, ethics or history), he should be as absolutely free to do this as to teach a theorem in geometry. Science can turn her back on no facts; and the true man of science, wholly uninfected with the rabies of the proselytizer, will teach his pupils to exercise their minds fearlessly and unflinchingly on all subjects. In short, a really free university will be as independent of Christianity as of Paganism, recognizing them both as facts of human experience and history, but showing deference and confessing allegiance to neither. Its thought must be free as air—its speech free as its thought; and if Christianity cannot co-exist with this freedom, so much the worse for Christianity.

Will the modern educator deny the truthfulness of this sketch, outlined in the rough though it be? Is not this his own ideal of a genuine university? And is it anywhere to be found realized in America? The answers to these questions seem to us very plain.

Does Cornell fall short of this absolute independence of Christianity? That is the question, so far as our supposed attack upon it is concerned. If the University is indeed thus independent, our illustration was unjust. If otherwise, our strictures on the vast public superstition which prevents this independence were just.

Now Prof. Russel, in saying—"We have nothing to do with the religions of our students"—to that extent approves our principle, that a free university must be independent of Christianity. But our principle means more than this. The University should have nothing to do with the religions of the public. The religious beliefs of the public should no more influence the University than the University should influence the religious beliefs of the students. Is it true that Cornell maintains "an equilibrium between religious systems, not catering to any orthodoxy, ecclesiastical or liberal?"

In showing from our friend's own statements that this is not the case, we want to be understood as blaming nobody. Our protest is directed against the public superstition that impairs the University's independence, not against the University itself. The Faculty are striving for a perfect freedom, and deserve the heart-felt sympathy of every liberal in the land. But it will not do to say that they have attained what they are so earnestly striving to attain. "Equilibrium"—the exact balancing of dead-weights—would not be enough, even were it secured; nothing will make the University independent except throwing the dead-weights overboard. But it is not secured.

Let us in the kindest spirit towards the University examine this point. Prof. Russel says that Cornell is "protected against sectarianism," yet not "abandoned to liberalism." Is there really any mean between sectarianism and liberalism? Not to be sectarian is to be liberal; not to be liberal is to be sectarian. Is it not plain that Cornell must be one or the other, or else partly both? In fact, it is both—somewhat sectarian and largely liberal. That this is so, is self-evident from Prof. Russel's statements. While no one sect can ever have a majority of the Trustees, the sects combined must always have a majority of them—this by the fundamental law of the University. That is, a majority of the Trustees must be always sectarians! Surely, that is not being protected against sectarianism. As against non-Christians, moreover, all Christians are of one sect; and to this sect (by the plain intent of the provision) is forever assured a majority of the Trustees of the University. So far, so very far, is Cornell from being independent of Christianity—emancipated from bondage to a superstitious and intolerant system.

But that this sectarian Board have, in the main, acted in a very unsectarian way, we rejoice to believe. They have appointed excellent men to office, and adopted a very liberal policy. But the very last sentence of our friend's article is a mistake, to our own personal knowledge. It is not a fact that appointments have been always uninfluenced "except by considerations of fitness for teaching and of personal character." In at least one instance, we know that the contrary has been the fact; but we prefer not to particularize.

Prof. Russel admits that there is one acknowledged "limitation" in the appointment of professors—that "no one could be appointed whose reputation as a non-Christian rendered it probable that he would use his situation as a point of attack against Christianity." But no such difficulty exists in the case of one whose reputation as a Christian makes it morally certain that he will use his situation as a point of defence for Christianity. A discrimination injurious to the freedom of science here obtains. Prejudice and bigotry, whether for or against Christianity, would be a good reason for refusing an appointment to any candidate. But the moment a university undertakes to prescribe to its professors beforehand what they shall or shall not teach, that moment it forfeits its right to the high claim of scientific independence. Unless the instructors are left at perfect liberty to teach whatever results conscientious and painstaking study has conducted them to, they are not free. We insist that there ought to be as complete freedom to criticise as to eulogise Christianity, provided it be done with decorum and a proper regard to the feelings of others. Since, moreover, it is plain that no one could ever acquire a "reputation as a non-Christian" except through public criticism of Christianity, our statement that no well-known non-Christian could be appointed in America to a professorial chair remains untouched by Prof. Russel's merely verbal modification. No appointment of a Unitarian is a case in point—the Unitarians all claiming to be Christians. And it requires a stronger faith than we possess in the liberality of any Board a majority of whom must be members of Christian sects, to believe that a well-known non-Christian would ever be appointed professor by it. This was the case we supposed, and no other case has any relevancy in testing the validity of our supposition.

The five points (which we did not "select" or "single out," but which were the only points made by Pres. White, so far as we know) specified in our criticism, and recapitulated by Prof. Russel, prove more than that no attempt is made to "undermine Christianity" at Cornell. However reluctantly, we must regard them as "concessions to orthodoxy" (if our word "cater," accidentally used, is offensive, we desire now to apologize for it). The invariable practice of having Christian prayer on public occasions—no "noble heretic" but Christians being even hinted at as eligible—and the support of Christian worship in a University chapel built for the purpose, commit Cornell to Christianity, and prevent the independent attitude which must characterize a thoroughly free university. There is no question of "suppressing" Christian prayer, that being properly an individual matter, but rather of supporting it. It is no part of the Faculty's duty to sustain worship of any kind; and if it does sustain Christian worship, it is a manifest and undeniable concession to the prevalent orthodoxy. It may be a necessary concession, but the necessity of it is the very evil against which we protest. We may be permitted, while gratefully acknowledging the courtesy of Prof. Russel's allusion to our own possible invitation to the University pulpit, to say frankly that we consider no pulpit or platform opened to us where there is even a tacit expectation that silence will be observed on any subject. When we speak on religion, we must be allowed to consult our own convictions of truth alone, and be freed from the obligation of respecting the taboo of superstition.

The assignment of a room for the use of student-meetings in general is perfectly proper, and would of course cover the meetings of a Young Men's Christian Association. If the room is a private donation to the students, the University has nothing to do with it; and the occupation of it does not even prove that the University refrains from "undermining Christianity." But unless the Faculty would as readily assign a room to a club of atheists as to the Young Men's Christian Association, its grant of a room to the latter is a "concession to orthodoxy."

The only object of mentioning donations from "earnest Christian men and women" must have been to show that Christians approve the work of the University as itself

Christian. The statement would be otherwise absolutely pointless. We gave in our own words what we understood to be the meaning of Pres. White, and think we gave it correctly.

It was no feeling of hostility or even coldness towards Cornell University that prompted our original reference to it. Whatever attack we made was not against it, but against the organic superstition of the country. With the utmost cheerfulness and cordiality we give our word of praise to the noble efforts and flattering success of the Faculty and Trustees in the service of education. But it is not true that Cornell is wholly free; and the only way to better existing institutions is to point out their defects, in order to remedy them. The friends of the University should not be sensitive to such criticism as ours, coming as it does from honest sympathy. Let them rather profit by the words of one too friendly to flatter, and aim at a higher freedom than they yet enjoy. That America may at last possess universities worthy of the name by being free as science itself, and that Cornell may be one of them, is our most earnest wish.

A VINDICATION OF CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY, Dec. 4, 1870.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—In your issue of the 19th ult. you printed a paper which you had read before the Cincinnati and Indianapolis Conventions, containing some severe remarks about the President of this institution, Mr. White. Your strictures, if unjust, ought to be proved so; if just, they will not suffer from examination. President White himself is weary of answering attacks from the orthodox party, and it is no more than fair that I should take his place when the blow comes from the liberals. Let me, therefore, examine the question from the Cornell point of view.

You say very correctly that the bitterest abuse has been heaped upon the officers of the University on account of their alleged hostility to Christianity. As often as these attacks accumulated to a certain point, President White answered them by a letter to some leading paper. Such was the one to the New York Evening Post on which you comment. He states at the outset the object to be, to answer the charge that we are pagans, haters of Christianity, laboring to overthrow it or undermine it; and he then gives some facts which tend to disprove it. You single out five of those facts and declare to the Conventions and to your subscribers that they make out a case, disgraceful to America, of "catering to jealous orthodoxy," and that President White defends his work on the plea that it is thoroughly Christian. On the contrary, I aver that he was bound as an honest man to make the statement which he did, and that none of the facts you have selected stamp upon "his work" any peculiarity of religious opinion. Before considering those points and their bearing, let us see the character of the charge to which he opposed them.

This University was founded in great part by the people of the United States, and is owned indirectly by those of this State. Those people are Christian, and love and reverence Christianity. Nothing could induce them to establish an institution to undermine their cherished system of religion. When, with more than-imperial munificence, they founded this University, they intended it for education only, especially in agriculture, the mechanic arts, science, literature, and military tactics. They made generous provision for the extension of its benefits; they protected it against sectarianism, and guaranteed to it the greatest possible freedom, "persons of every religious denomination or of no religious denomination" being "equally eligible to all offices and appointments." On the other hand, they did not abandon it to liberalism, but, while providing that "at no time shall a majority of the Board [of Trustees] be of one religious sect," they prescribed that at no time should a majority be "of no religious sect." With these guarantees, the people delivered their precious trust to the Trustees, and to the President and Professors to be appointed.

That President and these Professors have, then, a responsibility of no ordinary character. They are bound to a fidelity proportionate to the liberality which placed them here. Those who are sectarians must be faithful to liberty, and those of no religious sect must respect the convictions of the others; all must be true to the cause of intellectual education. We have no right to use our positions for the conversion of Japanese students from Buddhism to Christianity, nor of Ohio students from Christianity to Free Religion. It would be dishonest to do either. We have nothing to do with the religions of our students. Were they all wrong, all superstitious, all as pestilential as Bishop Huntington would consider yours, this is not the place to convert them,—we of all people are forbidden to do it.

But now comes attack after attack, "the bitterest abuse" falls upon us, and hot accusations that we are trying to undermine and overthrow Christianity. It is easy to show to any fair mind that this is not the case, that certain things are done here which would not be done if we were laboring in that direction, that the Christian religion is respected and facilitated, and that its influence is unchecked. President White, therefore, states these facts. He would have been false to the Trustees, to the Faculty, and to himself, if he had not done so. We were wrongly charged with unfaithfulness, want of truth; and he, our principal executive officer, was called on to show what the facts are. Of these facts you select the following, which it "grieved" you to see:—

1. On all public exercises of inauguration, etc., a prayer has been offered, and, "as it has happened," by an orthodox minister. President White says, however, that any "noble heretic," if present, would as readily have been invited. The fact of the orthodox having been asked proves, however, as far as it goes, that we have not been working against Christianity; but it shows nothing more.

2. A chapel is building. Every one knows that students are not now compelled, have not been compelled, and probably never will be compelled to attend chapel exercises. Certainly, however, a place for worship, and in a Christian country for Christian worship, seems a most proper feature of University architecture. Ours proves just this,—that we honor the religious element, and wish to have a place for religious exercises. When it is finished, you or Keshub Chunder Sen shall lead in social worship of God in it, if you wish; for I am sure that neither of you would use the opportunity to undermine the Christianity of the students.

3. Every day is opened with "Christian prayer" in the chapel. Nobody, however, attends unless he wishes to join in such prayer; and I do not see how we can interpose. It would be rather high-handed to suppress, by Faculty orders, Christian prayer,—would it not? When the East-Indians shall come in sufficient numbers, and shall wish to use the chapel a quarter of an hour a day for Brahminical prayer, they will undoubtedly have it. The Chinese and Japanese will probably build a joss-house for themselves; but if in the meantime they should use our chapel, would you object? If not, why be so severe on "Christian prayer?"

4. The Christian Association of our students meets in a room assigned to them. The literary societies meet in the same. It is the handsomest room of the kind I ever saw, adorned with bronze statuettes of great thinkers, and with very beautiful engravings of struggles for freedom. It did not cost the University a dollar, but is chiefly the gift of President White. He might have denied the application of the Christian Association. The Portsmouth resolutions would have justified discrimination; but he was too liberal to be guided by the narrowness of others, and he consented. To have compelled them to hire a room themselves outside would have had all the effect of persecution.

5. Lastly, as a proof that we are not laboring to overthrow Christianity, he states that several earnest Christian men and women who have examined and approved our work, [he says nothing about "its Christian character," as you inadvertently make him say], have given us some $200,000. But gifts do not prove similarity of faith. Humanity is getting the better of theology.

This communication will be so long before I finish, that I cannot stop to argue here that these facts, so stated by him in answer to the charge against which they were directed, concede nothing whatever to orthodoxy, offer nothing over which it can boast, make no plea that the work of the University is "thoroughly Christian." While they prove that we are not laboring to undermine Christianity, they are perfectly consistent with the maintenance of an equilibrium between religious systems, not catering to any orthodoxy, ecclesiastical or liberal.

At the same time, let not your readers suppose that this indifference is personal, and that the individual Trustees and members of the Faculty are not Christians, interested in maintaining and strengthening Christianity. That inference would be very illogical and very much opposed to the fact. Their private convictions and the cause of the University are very different things. Some of them are very religious members of Christian churches, and nearly all attend them. We have two members of your profession in the Faculty, and though we have no Sunday services ourselves, our students very generally attend those which are held in the village.

It is not completely true to say, as you do, that no one can be appointed to a professorial chair who is well known to the public at large as a non-Christian, and that the promised impartiality was not observed in the appointments here. It would be more correct to say that no one could be appointed whose reputation as a non-Christian rendered it probable that he would use his situation as a point of attack against Christianity. With that limitation, it is safe to say that the question of religious opinion is not raised in any appointment. Two instances fortify my opinion. While the question of appointing a Professor in the Scientific Department was pending, a high Episcopal dignitary wrote to the President, warning him that the applicant was a Unitarian. The President answered, that, even were he a Buddhist, he should have the place, if he were the best qualified in that specialty. The candidate was appointed. Again, in a correspondence respecting the Professorship of Architecture, the question of religious opinion having been suggested, the President told the applicant that he might believe in the Grand Lama, if he chose, and it should be no objection to him, if he could teach Architecture better than anybody else.

Mr. White is absent, otherwise I could probably add additional instances. Believe me, however, that, whatever his own convictions may be, no man was ever more just in according the fullest liberty of opinion to others; and that the appointments made here under his recommendation have never been influenced except by considerations of fitness for teaching and of personal character.

Yours in friendship and sympathy,
WILLIAM C. RUSSEL,
Associate Professor of History.

THOUGHTS TO LIVE BY.

We want no bread and wine, no baptismal font, no sacrificial blood, no Bible, any further than the latter will go to corroborate what we already know in our own experience. Hatred, Injustice, Cruelty, and Untruthfulness can be supplanted only by Love, Justice, Mercy, and Truth. Every unrestrained propensity has its antidote, and these are always at hand; these recuperative attributes are as free as the air we breathe; indeed the very atmosphere is impregnated with them; all we have to do is to keep our spiritual lungs in a condition to inhale them. Every sigh, every deep-seated desire, every aspiration after a higher and a better life, is prayer; to this prayer we shall have a response from the God or Goodness that is in us,—not from a God that is outside of us. This God, or great First Cause, or whatever we may call it, has something to do beside attending to our many and varied askings. I am now in my eighty-fourth year, and have never uttered a vocal prayer in my life. If hatred was in my heart towards a brother, love was in conflict with it; and while this conflict is going on, I am unhappy, or in hell, if you please; but I throw all my strength on the side of love, and it gains the victory; then I am happy, or in heaven, as far as love or hatred are concerned.

I have no doubt that, if Jesus was now with us, he would repudiate much that is recorded of him. I don't believe he ever performed a miracle that was not in strict accordance with laws that existed thousands of years before he was born; but owing to the ignorance and superstition of that day, he said, believed, and predicted many things that never took place. If he was more superhuman, or partook more largely of the blessings of his heavenly Father, other than what his complete obedience secured to him, he could be no example to us. If we are as obedient, we shall be just as good. SENEX.

A MODERN GHOST STORY.

DEAR INDEX:—I have just been to visit a very sick Christian relative, whom I expected to find calmly and hopefully prepared to leave this world; but upon my arrival I learned that he had not yet fully "set his house in order." Imagine my surprise when I tell you of the scenes I was called to witness. I presume you don't believe in witches or ghosts, but what I saw with my own eyes I know to be true. With me, "seeing is believing." Looking from an outer apartment into the sick chamber, I saw the sick man, and at his bedside one of Almighty God's appointed agents, and the devil perched upon the mantel on the opposite side of the room.

Now for an explanation of the condition and chance of the sick man. The agent I allude to was an Orthodox minister, who claims to have been divinely commissioned by God to "preach the gospel, heal the sick," and so on. Upon hearing him discourse, I soon discovered that either the man or God had made a mistake, inasmuch as the man showed no God-like disposition. To be as charitable as possible, I concluded that the man made the mistake unknowingly, he having misunderstood the voice of God, which said to him,—"Prepare thyself to teach others the way of salvation, by first learning the way of life thyself;" and he, being eager for the work, ran away from God before the last sentence of the command was uttered. Now the man looked modest enough, and honest too, but he was too fast once in his life, and only once, and has ever since been too slow, or too stupid to discover his mistake.

The devil I saw was in the form of a bottle of biters, another of cod liver oil, etc., (all recommended as good by the man of God), the vitiated air of the apartment, together with the smoke of a burning lamp, and the intrusion of the minister with his sophistical twaddle; and, in addition to this, visitors and attendants in the same room all the while, disturbing the quiet and repose of the sick man, so essential to the recuperative energies of nature to gather strength to cast out the (devil's) impurities from the system, which were all the while being increased by those poisonous drugs and unwholesome articles of food and drink.

Surely the picture of such a scene is not overdrawn by the similitude of "seven devils taken in by those who formerly occupied the place, and the last condition of that man being worse than the first." Truly Orthodox Religion and Drug Medication belong together. The latter is quite as much a superstition as the former—both of which are relics of the dark ages. So long as people regard disease as an entity, the devil will appear as a personality, and as soon as we learn to know that disease is a condition consequent upon violated physiological law, superstition of every kind and all faith in the supernatural will vanish together.

MEDICUS.

THE LATE CONVENTIONS.

[A venerable "Friend" sends us from the "City of Brotherly Love" an article on the late Conventions of the Free Religious Association, which cannot, on account of its great length, be published entire in our columns. It contains very full and very excellent abstracts of the addresses already given to our readers in No. 47; but we cannot spare room for repetitions of our own matter. The remarks of our genial correspondent, however, whom we would gladly oblige if we could, are all given below.—Ed.]

DEAR FRIEND F. E. A.:—Having finished reading, in the last INDEX and SUPPLEMENT, the addresses delivered at the meetings of your Free Religious Association held at Cincinnati and some other cities, I feel moved to give you my hearty God-speed. The importance of the subjects embraced, the ability with which they are treated, the amiable spirit which breathes through them, more than commend them to me,—their perusal has inspired feelings of joy and delight. Such truthful, earnest labors cannot but benefit the communities, large and small, that come within their reach, and greatly promote true religion and practical righteousness. And the great West, if I have formed a right estimate of the liberality and independence of its inhabitants, cannot but furnish an auspicious field for sowing the vitalizing seeds of truth, which will soon make it "white" even to an abundant and beneficent harvest.

The admirable variety of tone by which the different discourses modify each other has so impressed me, as among their peculiar excellences, that I cannot forbear, in illustration, to point to a few of the leading characteristics of several of them. And first and foremost, in order of time, take the finely catholic address of O. B. Frothingham.

I will next glance at the charming essay of W. J. Potter, on "The Unity of Spiritual Freedom, and the Opportunity which America affords for its Development." The essay is, in every respect, in beautiful keeping with the interesting theme it treats of, and evinces a mind richly imbued with piety and experimental religion, and desirous that all should enjoy their benefits.

In giving the leading points of this admirable essay I have endeavored to compress them into the shortest space possible. Their intrinsic value will make amends for its length. They deserve to be read and re-read.

To illustrate, in some measure, the fact referred to in the commencement of these remarks,—the difference of tone characterizing the addresses of the different speakers,—I will now bring briefly into view that of the cogent and iconoclastic Editor of THE INDEX. His subject,—"The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,"—will justify the spirit of his remarks, and show him to be the right man in the right place, although his style may not always possess so much suaviter in modo as that of his friend Potter.

But I must close this sketch, though much of what remains is equally interesting and important. I thank our friend Abbot for his lucid and timely warning of the deplorable effects of Superstition and Dogmatism, which he well designates twin devils. And let me here suggest to him, that of the many little imps which these devils have called into their service, and which have been long petted and hospitably entertained by the nominal Christian churches, both Catholic and Protestant, is the presumptuous title of Reverend and its fulsome associates, conferred on their "clergy," so called, and most graciously accepted by them. And I have noticed with some surprise the epithet "Rev." not only awarded to those clericals, but with apparent complacency prefixed to the names of their own preachers, by such noble reformers and radicals as the Free Religionists! I want to see the whole brood of devils, little and big, exterminated; and I feel confident that when this "coming man" arrives, this ridiculous assumption of titles will be banished from society, both religious and political, and those only retained which are necessary to distinguish offices.

I had thought to have noticed some more of the addresses, as the erudite production of Charles Reemelin, and the excellent remarks of Col. J. O. Martin, especially in deprecation of war, which possess an added interest from the fact, which I infer from the prefix of "Col." to his name, that he was an officer in our late affecting contest.

And now, in conclusion, permit me to say, that having passed seventy-nine summers, and "looking toward sunset," and sensible of declining physical energies, it affords me no little consolation, in this age of marvellous facilities for human enlightenment, to see those in the vigor of earlier manhood earnestly devoting themselves to the work of true reform, to which I have long endeavored to contribute my mite. THOS. MCCLINTOCK.

FREEDOM IN ASSOCIATION.

The second article of the Constitution of the Free Religious Association begins with these words: "Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions al ne." This sentence has been quoted and referred to again and again, yet it presents such a fundamental principle of the Association that it can hardly be too often reiterated. A few members of the Association, perhaps, not feeling the full force of this principle, sometimes manifest a little sensitiveness, as if they were somehow committed by the utterances of other members which they cannot accept. And the outside public, especially the ecclesiastical public, find the principle so difficult of comprehension that they are continually ignoring it, and falling into the mistake of making the Association, or the whole body of its constituents, responsible for the opinions of individual members. But that there is any ground in the Constitution, or in the action of the Association, for thus massing its members together in a common responsibility for the utterances of each other, cannot be for a moment conceded. This principle of individual freedom of opinion, carrying with it the full, unlimited right of inquiry, is a condition so essential to the very existence of the Association, and the statement of it has been made so plain, that it cannot be admitted that there is any reasonable ground for misunderstanding the Association in this regard. Those who were most interested in organizing it were not content that the Constitution should be so framed that individual freedom of opinion should be the actual underlying principle of every part, but they purposely put the principle into words, and words so plain as to be beyond dispute. They said that freedom should not even be restricted by any individual member being made to feel responsible for the views of another, or for the joint action of the Association itself, or its Executive Committee.

And this assertion of absolute freedom of thought in a religious organization on so large a scale, has not, we believe, before been attempted,—certainly not in this country; though in local societies it had been tried previously, and with success. Among the larger religious organizations in this country the National Unitarian Conference has gone farthest in the statement of individual freedom. Yet that Conference from the start has always meant to limit its fellowship to those who would in some sense accept the Christian name, and now, at its recent Convention, it has expressly said so in its Constitution. It would say of its members that they have a perfect right to think for themselves, and that they must, in fact, think and believe according to the dictates of their individual reason and conscience. But if reason and conscience should lead any of its members to reject the Christian name, that fact of itself, the Unitarian Conference says, carries such members beyond the limits of its fellowship. Or where reason and conscience have not led people who have been educated under other faiths to accept the Christian name, that fact, the Conference says, shows that such persons are not of its fellowship. But the Free Religious Association says to its members, let reason and conscience carry you where they will, the opinions you shall adopt need work no detriment to your membership. Though free inquiry should lead any member into atheism, it does not lead beyond the fellowship which this Association has attempted to represent. And no matter under what religion a person has been educated or what faith he still holds, the Association proffers him its fellowship. Making absolute freedom of opinion the basis of its membership, and declaring no member responsible except for his own opinions, it organizes a fellowship that is as broad as are human aspirations after truth and virtue.

Not a few persons, believing in the principles of the Association and in this large, free fellowship which it aims to represent, have yet doubted whether such principles and aims would admit of any specific organization. They have feared lest the exigencies of organization would come practically to interfere with individual freedom. It was well that the Association had to be organized and do its work under the critical vigilance of this apprehension. Yet those who favored and have sustained the organization, have been no less watchful for freedom. They felt that the time had come when mental and spiritual freedom could be made secure even in association; that people need not stand in individual isolation in order to keep their independence, but could come together to compare thoughts, to exchange sympathies, and to co-operate for the promotion of truth and right, and yet be entirely free; that, in fine, organization could be so effected as to combine the benefits of perfect freedom and the benefits of perfect fellowship.

And we believe that the members of the Free Religious Association generally will claim that this idea has been thus far realized. We know, too, that some of those who had apprehensions as to the result and could not counsel the experiment, have had their anxieties relieved, and would now encourage and sustain the organization. And those into whose hands the affairs of the organization have for the time been more immediately entrusted, and upon whom the main part of the work has devolved, while they may at times, perhaps, have been somewhat perplexed how on some practical point to combine things that have so long and generally been kept apart, freedom and fellowship, have yet, when they have placed themselves firmly on the fundamental principle of the Association, felt that it was both sure and practicable. A correspondent who took part in our recent Western Conventions, writes,—“One of the pleasantest features of our tour was the unity of feeling developed among ourselves. I never felt so drawn to our noble fellows as I did by this common work with them. Surely the spirit of freedom unites more closely than aught besides.” We believe that all who worked together in these Conventions will testify to the same experience. Every speaker felt himself perfectly free to utter his opinion whatever it might be; and there was in reality great difference of opinion and utterance among the speakers,—even among those who are officers and members of the Association. But a unity beneath these differences was very manifest,—a unity that is more than unity of opinion or even of purpose and aim,—that unity, namely, which comes of mutual respect for each other's opinions and from acknowledged equality of rights as to belief and utterance. In other words, it was spiritual fellowship on the basis of perfect mental freedom. And this was felt not only among the speakers, but in the audience; the fellowship was real and vital, and it was the fruit of freedom. The idea of the Association,—fellowship through freedom, individual independence in social co-operation,—was practically realized.

Were it found that this theory of the Association would not bear the test of practice, that the exigencies of organization should anywhere necessarily hamper the thought or action of any member, that individual freedom would be interfered with in the slightest degree, no one would be ready sooner than the writer of this article to say, let the Association be abolished. Deeply as he has been interested in its organization and success, grand and nobly humane as he believes its aim, true and pure as he conceives its principle to be in theory, yet show him that the freedom of any member is to be abridged by its operations, and he will be the first to cry,—Let the Association be instantly destroyed. Still believing in the principle and in its ultimate practicability, he would yet say that the time for organization had not yet come,—that mental freedom in all its aspects must first be achieved, and that then the perfect fellowship would follow. But he believes that thus far the Association has stood the practical test. The simple organization that has been effected has jeopardized no man's liberty. Mental freedom and independence have been proved possible even in religious association. Liberty and Union,—those are our words,—Liberty being the bond of Union.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on “The Idea of the Free Religious Association;” DAVID A. WASSON, on “The Nature of Religion;” MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on “Religion as a Social Force;” F. E. ABBOT, on “The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;” S. JOHNSON, on “The Natural Sympathy of Religions;” RABBI WISE, on “The Universal Elements in Judaism;” COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on “Mohammedanism;” WM. H. CHANNING, on “The Religions of China;” W. J. POTTER, on “The Religions of India;” and an abstract of a discussion on the “Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States.” This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING's Address on “THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA,” (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on “THE WORSHIP OF JESUS” (50 cents), and an essay on “REASON AND REVELATION,” by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the “Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj,” also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on “Religion and Social Science;” a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on “Religious Movements in England,” and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

The heresy of Woman's Rights is making startling progress. The president of a Theological School is said to have occupied a pulpit in Essex county lately, and addressed the Sunday School, expressing the hope that some of the boys might become ministers; but he also chanced to express his dislike of women in the sacred office. To his dismay he was promptly rebuked by sharp words and abrupt departures, and at the evening conference meeting such volleys of indignation were fired at his offending head that the Dr. pronounced it “the most celestial row” of which he has had any experience.—Christian Register.

A young clergyman, being about to preach for a father in the ministry, was asked whether he would not like “to be by himself” awhile. “No,” was the prompt reply, “I am already cocked and primed.” The old minister afterward remarked that “he flashed in the pan.”

THE INDEX.
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1 69, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists or subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

THE INCARNATION.

A CHRISTMAS DISCOURSE.

[Read to the First Independent Society in Toledo, December 19, 1869.]

"They shall call his name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is, God with us."

MATTHEW I, 23.

The merry season of Christmas has come round once more. To every one educated under the influences of Christianity, no matter how widely he may have strayed from the faith of his ancestors, there is something inexpressibly sweet and tender in the associations that cluster so thickly about the day. Even if its religious meanings are irrecoverably lost, —even if his intellect has outgrown all attachment to seasons and symbols, or ceased to pay reverence to the events they commemorate and the ideas they symbolize, —still there lingers about the very thought of Christmas that golden glow of the imagination which keeps it ever beautiful and ever fresh. How vividly it reminds us of the far-off days of childhood, with their bright hopes and eager anticipations, — their dreams of stockings filled fat over-night by the hand of mysterious, delightful, comical old Santa Claus, or their visions of wonderful trees which, by some curious law not explained in learned books on botany or arboriculture, bore a brilliant foliage of wax-tapers and a generous fruitage of candy, spangles, and toys! To the childish mind, Christmas is fairy-land made real for one, at least, out of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. It is the very poetry and music of our too prosaic modern world. Home puts on its holiday attire; father and mother exchange their careworn looks for smiles, while their little ones dance and laugh in exuberance of glee. For the sake of the children, at least, let Christmas live forever!

But not for the sake of the children alone should we rejoice in the return of this heart-warming festival. It is good for us all that once in a while the world should enjoy a breathing-spell in its hot pursuit of gain. If there is a spark of geniality and good fellowship in a man, it will kindle into a flame when Christmas comes. A common sentiment of human brotherhood is awakened by its advent. Everybody you meet looks good-natured and kindly. A cross face at Christmas would be blasphemy, and a mean spirit would be the unpardonable sin. Even the stingiest fellow thaws out into a little liberality, while the generous heart glows with willingness to give. All souls are fused into one under the influence of a common sympathy. It is a day too joyous for the nursing of old grudges. Unless a man is soured in the very depths of his nature, he will cherish a friendly and fraternal feeling towards all his neighbors, and strive to make at least one heart the happier on this genial day. Above all, the poor should be remembered with timely gifts. Those who are blessed, not merely with opulence, but also with an opulent soul, will need no hint to remind them that a little aid rendered to honest poverty at the glad Christmas season becomes radiant with the sentiment of the hour, loses the hard look of charity, and wounds no honorable pride with the painful sense of obligation. If ever we may innocently covet riches, surely it is when Christmas comes.

Perhaps Christmas is quite as much indebted, for its beauty and gladness, to heathenish, as it is to Christian, associations. In my own experience, at least, it is the grotesque conception of jolly old Kris-kringle, or Santa Claus, — the reindeer sledge, the pockets splitting with presents, the mysterious descent down the chimney, the miraculous preservation of the toys from soot and breakage, the supreme moment of rapture when, long before daylight, we waked up to find our stockings crammed full of paper parcels, and jumped back into bed to fumble them over in the dark, hoping to discover what new treasures we had got through the sensation in our finger-ends, — it is this strange jumble of Yankee-land and fairyland that I remember with chief delight; and for this I am under obligation to Germany rather than Palestine. Yet I would not be ungrateful for the strictly Christian traditions of the day. These, too, are beautiful, if we regard them as the cloud-pictures of a poetical mythology. Standing freely outside of Christian dogmatism, we become enabled to admire intelligently the loveliness of those simple legends, which have inspired the great masters of Christian art in the creation of their sublime works. The Virgin Mother with her babe born in the manger, the humble stable with the oxen quietly chewing the cud, the adoration of the Magi with their sumptuous gifts of frankincense and myrrh and gold, the appearance of the heavenly host to the shepherds tending their flocks by night, and the seraphic song of joy — "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill to men," — surely he can have no poetry in his soul, who, once freed from the tyranny of dogmas, can see no beauty in these charming dreams. They are the warp and woof of the grandest poems, the ideal framework of the most magnificent paintings, the soul and inspiration of the divinest music, that the world has yet known. Treat them, then, as you treat the glorious visions of the Iliad and Odyssey, or the wild and gloomy myths of the Northern Sagas; treat them as the outgrowth of poetic imagination, stimulated to activity by the spirit of the olden times. But let us not, because dreams have been taken for facts, or because hard-headed theologians have forged chains of iron out of gossamer fancies, despise these Christian traditions as worthless, or make them a reason for abolishing the dear, old, happy day of Christmas.

The poetic admiration, however, which we feel for these traditions, must not cause us to evade the duty we owe to historic truth.

In the biting cold of a winter's morning, when even the sunlight seems to shiver as it glances from the sparkling snow, few pause to admire the delicate frostwork upon their window-panes. Yet what a miracle of creative genius is there! What a net-work of crystal shoots and threads of silver, interlaced in the most fantastic patterns, and studded profusely with diamond spangles of every form! Here are Cathedrals with groined arches and towering spires; castles with lofty battlements; temples, mosques, and pagodas, more gorgeous than ever adorned an oriental metropolis. There are forests of pines on long mountain-slopes, with Alpine crags and shining pinnacles beyond them, and labyrinths of tropical ferns and luxuriant vegetation at their base. The artists of Elftand seem to have pictured forth its wondrous landscapes in an ethereal tracery of light; the Ice-King seems to have swept the frosty heavens by night, and frozen into a little sheet of crystals the twinkling pageantry of the stars. What boundless magnificence of beauty will not a seeing eye and soul discover on a wintry window-pane! Yet how fugitive is the spectacle! Let the admiring beholder approach too closely, and the spell of the enchantment is broken; a single breath dissolves it. That which transcends the most exquisite creation of human art perishes at a touch, and leaves no trace of its glory save a few trickling tears. The frosty architecture of winter is as fragile as the flowers of summer; neither will survive ungentle handling. Approach your frost palace too familiarly, and it melts "like the baseless fabric of a dream."

Thus it is with the lovely legends which cluster around the birth of Jesus. They are poetry, not history. If we come too near, our hot breath destroys the delicate frost-work of our imagination. Such stories are the glory or nimbus which fancy suspends above the head of every saint. Their truth can consist only in the true aspirations which their beauty is fitted to create in human souls. Life deserts the past, and dwells only in the present. He makes the noblest use of these fair traditions who suffers them, like sweet poem, to kindle better purposes and purer thoughts within; he celebrates Christmas most truly in whose heart the song of the angels most melodiously sings itself afresh today.

Is there not, after all, some thing noble and necessary in the honor paid by mankind to a life like that of Jesus? Strip off from his person the mock-purple of false divinity, — discard the tawdry ornaments of miracle, — destroy the baubles of crown and sceptre with which dogma has burdened him, — yet does there not remain the figure of a true and manly man? For myself, I refuse to allow the creed of Christendom to exercise such power over my thought or feeling, as to warp me from a fair and generous appreciation of perhaps the grandest character known to history. I refuse to be polarized into injustice, or even indifference, to spiritual greatness that deserves my reverence. "Sir!" exclaimed Voltaire impatiently, when some one spoke to him of Jesus, "let me never hear that man's name again!" I cannot share that feeling. It concerns my self-respect, at the thought of Jesus, to be as much above antagonism or childish petulance, as to be above the servility of worship. To the fascination of high integrity and spiritual worth, let us count it a weakness to be insensible. Without everlastingly harping on his name, let us nevertheless pay with a sincere heart that tribute of admiration which his purity and services to man most justly demand. If it is a fitting thing to honor the memory of Shakespeare, of Washington, of Humboldt, it is a fitting thing to honor Jesus also by celebrating his memorial day. However unable to be in any especial or peculiar sense his disciples, it becomes us, as it becomes every member of the race he so nobly served, not churlishly to slight the festival which commemorates his birth. Among the associations which endear it to us on other grounds, let us not with studied indifference ignore its association with the beautiful spirit, the great character, and the unselfish toils of Jesus.

What connection, however, exists between the birth of Jesus and the twenty-fifth of December? What is known concerning the true date of the event which Christmas is designed to keep fresh in the memory of man?

The "Christian Era," as it is called, — that is, the reckoning of events from the year A. D. 1, the supposed year of the birth of Jesus, — owes its origin to the Romish ecclesiastic Dionysius Exiguus, in the year A. D. 525; and it is therefore often called the "Dionysian Era." It is not known, however, to have been publicly recognized or used, until Ethelbert, an Anglo-Saxon king of Kent, in England, during the period of the Heptarchy, dated one of his documents "in the 605th year from the Incarnation of Christ," that is, in the year A. D. 605. The Anglo-Saxon historian, Venerable Bede, and the Frankish kings Pepin and Charlemagne, afterwards brought this mode of reckoning into general use. Now the year 1 of the Christian or Dionysian Era, from which the modern civilized world dates all its transactions and events, coincides with the year 754, reckoned from the founding of the city of Rome. According to the received calculation, therefore, Jesus was born in the year A. D. 1 and the year A. U. C. 754. But almost all modern scholars, without regard to their creed, are of one mind, that this calculation of Dionysius places the birth of Jesus four years too late; so that, strange and absurd as it sounds, he was born really in the year B. C. 4, and the year A. U. C. 750. That is to say, if the so-called Christian era really commenced with the birth of Jesus, as it is supposed to do, we should now be in the year 1873, not 1869. All Christendom is thus four years "behind time." The chief proof of this fact on which scholars rely (although several other lines of argument all lead to the same result) is drawn from the work of Josephus, entitled "The Jewish Antiquities," in which he says that Herod the Great died "thirty-seven years from the time that he had been declared King by the Romans;" and, since Josephus elsewhere fixes the date of this event in the year A. U. C. 714, it follows, from the Jewish mode of reckoning the beginning of the year, — that Herod died in the year A. U. C. 750, and not in the year A. U. C. 754, as commonly supposed. Now, for various reasons, it is evident that Jesus was born during the life-time of Herod, and could not, therefore, have been born later than A. U. C. 750. It follows, consequently, that Jesus was born, not in the year A. D. 1, but in the year B. C. 4; and the Christian Era ought to have begun at least four years earlier.

As to the day of his birth, nothing at all is known with certainty, or even with probability. The early church had no Christmas at all, and celebrated only two annual festivals, — Easter, to commemorate the Resurrection, and Pentecost, to commemorate the descent of the Holy Ghost. They did not seem to care at all about the date of Jesus' birth: it was his supposed resurrection that interested them. Neither Justin Martyr, Tertullian, nor Origen, makes any mention of Christmas. The first traces of it are found in Egypt. Clement of Alexandria, a learned Christian who flourished more than two hundred years after Christ, says nothing of it, but declares that no one knew the date of his birth, some fixing it on the twentieth of May, others on the nineteenth or twentieth of April. When the first trace of Christmas is discovered, it is the sixth of January, this being also the supposed date of his Baptism. The first mention of Christmas as being celebrated on the twenty-fifth day of December is about three hundred and fifty years after Christ; and this is at Rome, under the appointment of Julius, the Bishop or Pope. Thus the earliest observance of the twenty-fifth day of December as Christmas is found at Rome; and the reason for the arbitrary selection of this date is probably to be found in the Pagan festival of the Saturnalia, which lasted from Dec. 17 to Dec. 25. The heathens made their festivals so enjoyable that many Christians attended, and were in consequent danger of backsliding. Probably to prevent this, Christmas was appointed to be observed at the same time. Thus the date on which we celebrate Christmas has really no connection with the birth of Jesus, but was adopted in imitation of a heathen festival. According to the Roman calendar, this was the date of the winter solstice, when the sun begins to return northward, to revive the earth with his light and heat once more; and it was declared to be a most fitting day on which to celebrate the rising of the "Sun of Righteousness with healing in his beams." However this may be, it is quite certain that the December celebration of Christmas first began at Rome, and spread from thence into the East, where it gradually supplanted the other times of its celebration.

But the discussion of dates is dry business. Let us inquire whether Christmas represents any great idea or truth, or whether it has only a memorial significance.

To the Christian Church, this festival is the commemoration of the greatest event of all human history, the Incarnation of the Infinite God, his assumption of human nature and the human form for the purpose of rescuing a ruined race. "Emmanuel—God with us," this, the Incarnation of God in Christ, Father Hecker declares to be the great truth on which the Catholic Church rests. It is the truth on which the Evangelical Protestants also claim to rest. In fact, it is the logical result of the doctrine that Jesus is the Christ; and it sums up the whole of Christianity to those who are deeply devoted to that faith. God in Christ, as the redeeming power which alone can rescue from sin and everlasting death,—this, to a soul terror-struck at its own supposed danger, is the great Rock of Refuge; and Christmas is the world's public recognition of this truth of all truths.

Now shall we say that the doctrine of the Incarnation, thus cherished in millions of souls as the divinest and most precious faith, is nothing but a lie of a few designing priests, concocted for the purpose of holding the people in subjection? Or shall we say that it is a feeble shadowing-forth of a great truth, false in so far as it is feeble, but great in so far as it is a truth? Can any man who has a particle of reverence for the human mind believe it possible for any absolute error to keep and retain such mastery over mankind as this doctrine has incontestably kept and retained? No—the statement refutes itself. There is not enough life in a lie to make it live so long or become such a force in history. Whatever idea abides in the human mind for age after age, and exerts such enormous influence on human destiny, may be all overlaid with error, but there must be a truth at the bottom of it. If this were otherwise, what hope for any one in the battle with ignorance or superstition? The only hope of victory must come from the certainty of the ultimate expulsion of falsehood from the human consciousness. This I hold to be a fundamental principle in dealing with ideas. To believe that the human mind has no protection in its own nature against the permanent retention of absolute error, would be to preach the doctrine of Total Idiocy; and that would be as bad as the doctrine of Total Depravity.

The great Christian doctrine of the Incarnation is, in my judgment, false in what it denies, but substantially true in what it affirms. The Christians believe in God incarnate in a single man,—I believe in God incarnate in all men, in humanity itself. They believe in Emmanuel in a narrow sense, as God with Jesus,—I believe in Emmanuel in a wide sense, as God with all men, with you and with me. They believe in the Incarnation, as "God manifest in the flesh" in Christ alone, and in nobody else; I believe in the Incarnation, as "God manifest in the flesh" in every human soul, from the infant that utters his first wail of pain to the patriarch that lays his silvery head on the pillow of death,—from the saint that shines resplendent in the beauty of holiness, to the sinner that insults the pure light of the skies with wicked deeds. They believe in the Incarnation as a single stupendous Fact, unique and unrelated,—a fact out of harmony with the orderly course of Nature, and in utter overthrow of her venerable uniformities; I believe in the Incarnation as a grand and universal Law, of which the historic Jesus was simply a luminous illustration,—a law in harmony with that still larger law by which God is everywhere immanent in all his works, and thus in admirable concord with every other natural law and fact. In a word, the Christians affirm God to have been in Jesus, but deny him to be in the ruined and depraved nature of other men; I also affirm him to have been in Jesus, but equally affirm him to have been in all other men, whose nature, however defaced by inherited or voluntary evil, still bears the divine likeness and exists solely by the indwelling Divine presence and activity.

I thus affirm what the Christians affirm, and also what they deny; do I not, then, make good my claim that my faith in the Incarnation is larger than theirs? Is it not clear that the great truth which I accept in its absoluteness, as a divine law unlimited either in space or time, they mutilate and reduce to an exceptional fact, limited to a particular epoch and a particular locality? Let them retain their Emmanuel, who lit the darkened skies two thousand years ago like a meteor that flashes and expires; but let us retain ours, which lights the heavens like a sun that never sets. Their Incarnation was transient,—mine is eternal. God was indeed in Jesus; but most of all he is in that Humanity which abides in all ages and all climes as a permanent, natural revelation of himself,—which no one man, however divine, can express in all its divine possibilities,—which shall incarnate more and more of the Infinite Spirit throughout the countless æons of eternity. God was indeed in that august man of Palestine; but he is as truly in you, men and women of America,—as truly in you who listen to my poor fleeting words as in him who uttered words that will live forever. The Eternal Goodness that found such melodious self-articulation in the life of Jesus, and spoke with such tenderness and power in that pure and lovely soul, is struggling, friends, to utter a word of equal beauty in your life and mine.

The joyous festival of Christmas, therefore, which throws so soft a sunset glow about the departing year, is to me a solemn and fit reminder of this most stupendous of all truths. It means to me, not alone the Incarnation of God that took place when Jesus was born in Bethlehem, but still more the Incarnation of God that took place when you and I were born. The boundless vast of space, with its systems and constellations, its galaxies and starry nebulae, stretching on and onward to infinity, is the only temple worthy of the Eternal and Infinite Spirit; yet in the inner Sanctuary of Humanity,—in the sweet and pure soul that loves and adores,—he has set apart his chosen Holy of Holies, and broods forever in the sacred solitude, veiled in the splendor of his own Shekinah.

To us, then, Christmas is a beautiful memento of the perpetual Incarnation of God in each human soul. It is a memento, also, of that larger Incarnation of God in Humanity as a whole, which is the fountain whence the stream of History takes its rise, and which manifests itself century after century in the gradual triumph of truth over falsehood, right over wrong, love over hate. Grand indeed is this march of God through the ages, overthrowing oppression and evil in all their myriad forms, and ushering in the day when righteousness and peace shall inhabit the whole world of man. Let Christmas, then, be honored more and more; and as it now makes beautiful the death of the aged year, so may the divine truth it celebrates make a thousand-fold more beautiful the ending of our human lives!

EVENING SCHOOLS IN TOLEDO.

Interesting Report to the Board of Education.

[From the Toledo Blade of Dec. 7.]

The subject of "Evening Schools" having been referred to a Select Committee of the Toledo Board of Education, at the last meeting of that body, Gen. CHAS. W. HILL, Chairman of the Committee, presented the following report, which was adopted. The action taken will provide the means of at least a partial education to many who are at present in a fair way to grow up in ignorance. The Committee of the Board deserve thanks for the judicious action they have taken in order to supply a great desideratum in our educational system:—

"The Select Committee to which was referred the petitions of sundry citizens asking the Board to establish evening schools for such youth in our midst, as must otherwise be deprived of the means of education, have held two meetings, and with much valuable assistance from persons having knowledge of such schools, and the light thrown upon the subject by statements and reports within our reach, now

REPORT.

That the Committee feel no doubt about the legal authority of the Board to aid in this enterprise. The Board have power, at their discretion, to use every judicious means of disseminating a common school education. In aid of that end, all of their powers are to be liberally construed. To educate the youth and bring them into elevating and useful relations to the community, is the cheapest way of promoting public virtue, intelligence and general prosperity, while it diminishes the necessity of expenses for the public and poor house system.

We have not had time to consult reports of evening schools in many of the cities of this country, though they have been tried in many places, and so far as we know, when once fairly tried, have not been abandoned. Only one experiment has been made here, and that was during the last winter, when the Board contributed aid to a very limited amount. An average of about 125 boys and men attended a free evening school in Lenk's Block, for over four months, taught by philanthropic ladies and gentlemen, with many marked advantages to the scholars. Saturday afternoons free instruction was given to girls. Like most first efforts, the enterprise labored under many disadvantages, but enough was accomplished to warrant a second effort, even if we have only our home light on this question. But we are not thus limited. Light from abroad tells our Board of duty heretofore neglected, and of success which they may win, by small expenditures in aid of a properly organized effort. We cite a few instances.

In 1850 evening schools were started in Providence, R. I., and in 1869, though none were allowed to attend who could attend day schools, the attendance of the evening schools ran up to 2,000 pupils, closing after a session of from four to six months nearly as full as they began. Many completed all of the branches taught in the day schools, and young men entered college direct from the evening schools. By a liberal system of volunteering, the best of teaching talent was obtained for these evening schools.

In 1865 (but how much earlier we are not advised), the city of Troy, N. Y., had regularly organized evening schools as a part of their school system. The number of youth in the city, from five to 21 years of age, for the year ending October 1st, 1865, was 13,683. There were three evening schools, having an aggregate enrollment of 510 pupils under nine teachers, and an average attendance of 235 pupils, at an expense of $1.13 on each pupil enrolled, and of $2.45 on each in the average attendance. For what periods of time these evening schools are kept up in Troy does not appear, but we infer for all of the time during which the rule requiring the attendance of 25 in a boys' school, and 20 in a girls' school, was complied with. When the number in attendance, in either case, falls below that limit, then the school is to be closed.

Since the year 1861, evening schools have been an important part of the public schools in Chicago. They are kept in operation from the middle of Nov. to the middle of Feb., and usually have a session of thirteen weeks. They are highly spoken of and commended by the school officers of that city. The annual expenditure for those schools by the Board of Education of that city appears to have been over $6,000. The total enrollment in the evening schools for the term closed February 13, 1867, was 3,212, and the average attendance for the whole term 937, and the expenditures were as follows: Paid teachers, $5,606.00; paid janitors, $297.15; fuel, $601.25; light, $403.03; cost per scholar on the enrollment, $2.20; on attendance, $7.50. It appears that five of the buildings used for day schools are also used for the evening schools. An evening High School for boys was also recommended by the Chicago Board three years ago.

The report from St. Louis for the year 1866-7 shows that evening schools had become well established there before 1859, when the School Board took them. They begin annually in October, and continued 16 weeks. They provide for both boys and girls, but receive no pupil less than thirteen years of age, and none over twenty-four. They had an evening High School, for both sexes, with 127 in attendance. Eight of the public school buildings were partially occupied, and 30 teachers employed, including five in the Evening High School. In the other schools there were 28 pupils to a teacher. The total enrollment was 1,553; in attendance at the close, 649. The cost of evening schools for the session was $5,450.40. How much of this was paid to teachers is not stated, nor does it appear whether all of the evening schools were taught by teachers of the day schools, though to a large extent they were. The St. Louis Superintendent makes a strong point against using the same buildings for both day and evening schools in the dirt, disorder and damage naturally resulting from the occupancy for evening schools and from the fatigued condition in which both teacher and pupil come to the evening's work. He argues that the instruction imparted and received is relatively less valuable than that in the day school. He urges that admission to evening schools should be limited to those over fourteen years of age.

In view of the whole case the committee have come to the following conclusion:

1st, That evening schools are now very much needed in this city, and will be more and more needed as our manufacturing population increases, and that the Board must take charge of and aid them.

2d, That large and valuable public school buildings are not now needed and should not be used for evening schools.

3d, That the youth of the city, of both sexes, who are over thirteen years of age, and unable to attend a day school, should be admitted to evening schools, for a period of sixteen weeks, from the fifteenth of November, provided the average attendance in such evening school equals 45 per cent. of its numbers when organized, and not afterwards; but that boys and girls be not admitted to the same school or schools in the same building without the direct order of the Board.

4th, That in place of ordinary school furniture, cheap tables, made for the purpose, sufficient to accommodate twelve scholars each, be used, with chairs for seats, and that these tables, at the close of the school, be "knocked down" and stored with the other furniture for evening schools until again needed. That the Board accept such sufficient rooms as may be offered for this purpose, free of rent, and provide for warming and lighting such rooms during the evenings of occupancy for schools.

5th, That evening schools for the present winter commence as soon as rooms can be prepared, and due notice thereof shall be given by the Superintendent or committee in charge of the same.

6th, That a committee of three be appointed to serve as a Standing Committee on Evening Schools, and that committee, by appointment or otherwise, secure the services of a competent Superintendent of such evening schools who shall faithfully superintend the working of said schools and do all in his power to make them a credit to the city and most beneficial to the community.

7th, That the Superintendent shall gather up and report to the Board, through said committee monthly and oftener if required, such statistics as are usual with reference to other public schools; and at the close of the term he shall embody all such facts, and any other facts required by the committee in a full and final report. He shall be paid at the rate of sixteen dollars per month for the first term.

8th, That five hundred dollars be appropriated out of the school fund to defray the expenses of evening schools for the first term, and be expended under the direction of said committee.

9th, That said committee and the superintendent appoint and fix the compensation of janitors.

10th, That said committee make an immediate appeal to citizens and teachers for voluntary assistance, in books, slates, and service in teaching, so as to carry through the first term successfully.

11th, That the committee be authorized to increase the number so far as may be necessary by appointing citizens as associate members to aid them in the work.

Dec. 6, 1870. CHAS. W. HILL, Chairman.

Motion of Mr. Rogers, Messrs. Hill, Shoemaker, and Braun were continued as the Committee on Evening Schools, and directed to carry the recommendations of the foregoing report into effect.

HELP FOR EVENING SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Commercial of Dec. 7.]

The undersigned, pursuant to the order of the Board of Education, appeal to the citizens of Toledo for help to establish and sustain evening schools in this city for the term. There are a large number among us who, impelled to labor through the day, cannot attend day schools, and are thus deprived of all means of education. By the increase of manufacturing and population, this class must rapidly multiply. Every tax-payer—every good citizen—must see the necessity of making it possible for this portion of our youth to acquire at least the rudiments of an education. The good effects of increasing the abilities and elevating the purposes of those who, in their early life, are deprived of ordinary school facilities, all must understand. Evening schools seem to be the means by which the most valuable of all help can be brought to this class. Elsewhere such schools have wrought inestimable benefits, and here at home they have been tested. Last winter a number of philanthropic ladies and gentlemen established such a school in this city and conducted it for nearly four months with encouraging success. The prompt attendance, in order, studious habits and eagerness of the scholars to continue their studies, are the best evidence of the utility of that enterprise. Our Board of Education not doubting that in this they duly represent the public wish, desire to do all in their power to place means of education within the reach of all already provided for. They want, by voluntary books, slates and teachers, so that all over thirty years of age who ought to be admitted to evening schools, shall be amply provided for. The committee informed that the necessary rooms will be free. The Board have appropriated $500 for fuel, light, furniture and the services of superintendent and janitor. That is all that the Board have the means to do this time. They need all of the persons to teach can give instruction and will volunteer for that purpose. Reading, writing, spelling and arithmetic will be the chief branches taught. Teachers engaged in the day schools can scarcely be expected to occupy much time in the evening schools; therefore the great necessity of volunteering by those who are now engaged as professional teachers. It is proposed to organize so that two or more teachers shall be added to the same class, and that, if convenience requires, they teach alternately.

FIFTY TEACHERS ARE WANTED.

Those willing to do this will please meet the Committee at the office of the Board of Education, (Room No. 20, Drummond Block), at 7:30 P. M., of Friday, the 9th inst.

THE EVENING SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Blade of Dec. 12.]

The committee on subject announce that Free Evening Schools will be opened in this city next week, to be continued, if practicable, until the middle of March next. A school for boys and young men will be opened in the second-floor room over the U. S. Express office, in Daniel's Block, on Wednesday, Dec. 14th; and another for girls and young women in basement room "A," Campbell's Block, on Friday, Dec. 16th. It is also contemplated to open two other schools for young women and girls, if there appears to be necessity; one at the Oliver House, for scholars in the 5th Ward, and one in the Hanks' Block on Cherry street, owned by Mr. J. W. Scott.

After the 18th inst. these Evening Schools will be held on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week, opening at 7 and closing at 9 o'clock P. M. The Committee have appointed Superintendents, who are to serve during the term, without charge, as follows: On Monday evenings, Col. D. F. DeWolf; on Wednesday evenings, E. W. Lenderson; on Friday evenings, Mr. Marx. The free use of the rooms has been generously donated.

At the meeting of the committee on the 9th inst., teachers enough volunteered to complete the first organization; but a large number of scholars is expected as the schools open, and many additional teachers will, doubtless, be needed from the 18th instant until the end of the term. Ladies and gentlemen willing to assist after the 18th inst., will please send their names, with residence, to the Chairman of the Committee, at room No. 8, Drummond Block, indicating their choice of the evenings designated.

Books, slates, &c., will be wanted for the use of the pupils, many of whom may be unable to provide their own. Looking to the generous example of others, it is confidently expected that this want will be well supplied by our business men, who are requested to send contributions to Dr. Valentine Braun or H. L. Holloway, of the Committee, or to either of the Superintendents, who will apply the same to meet the wants of indigent pupils. But where the pupils of these Evening Schools are able to provide their own books, it is better, even for them, and they will be required to do so. Children under 13 years of age are hardly fit for night study, and comparatively of little value for day labor, therefore they should, until 13 years of age, depend upon the day schools, and under the rule of the Board cannot be admitted to night schools.

Parents, guardians, manufacturers and all others who have persons under their charge who cannot attend the Day Schools, and who would be benefited by the Evening Schools, are earnestly requested to see that they regularly attend the Evening Schools throughout the term. It is suggested to those who buy books to buy the same that are used in our Day Schools. Pupils will be advised of the particular books needed by the teachers when they first enter the school. Probably a slate, one reader and one arithmetic, will be the limit at first.

Here is a great work for the good people of Toledo, in which all can unite, and as citizens, all be benefited. So far, all who have been called upon for aid have been generous, energetic and united. Now for the response which must come from our own better natures when duty is nobly done, and for the credit and advantage of the community and the amelioration of those who so much need our help, let us all unite in carrying this enterprise to the most complete success. It promises fair. Let its fruits be grateful and abundant. By order of the Committee.

CHARLES W. HILL, Chairman.

The Committee request that all of the city papers copy the above.

CHRISTMAS PIES.—Mince, or rather minced, pies not only pertain to this season, but should rightfully be called Christmas pies. The custom of making a pie of this kind at this season was derived from the presentation of paste images and sweet-meats to the Fathers of the Vatican on Christmas Eve. The origin of the latter custom was probably Pagan. In the middle ages, the bakers at this season used to present their customers with Yule dough in the images of baked paste. This custom has survived in our New Year cakes, or cookies, as the Dutch call them; the figures on which are probably mere descendants and modifications of images with Christian names, which themselves were descendants and representatives of heathen idols. With such tenacity do men cling to a once well-established popular custom. Minced pies having this origin and significance, it must be admitted that Puritans were not quite so narrow minded as they have seemed to be in their refusal to eat them at Christmas time. It is only within a generation that the Presbyterian and Congregationalist descendant of the Puritan of two centuries ago, has been persuaded to yield his principles and digestion to the uncovenanted mercies of the maker of Christmas pies—profane, idolatrous and indigestible.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS.—It is customary among the Saxons to dress their houses in green and give presents at the Feast of Yule. Gifts of money were given by the Romans at the Paganalia, [the name alludes to villages (pagi), a certain number of which were appointed by the emperor, and in each an altar was raised for annual sacrifices to their tutelary gods] which occurred near the beginning of the year; and the coins were received in earthen pots or boxes; hence the origin of the English Christmas box, which is now the name for the present which the box was formerly used to contain. Santa Claus, who is supposed to visit children on Christmas Eve, is the Dutch form of the name of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of children. According to a mediaeval legend, he once saved the daughters of a nobleman from disgrace by throwing a mass of gold into the house in the night time. Hence presents were put into the shoes of children in the night time on the Feast of St. Nicholas, which came on the 6th day of December, that they might suppose them to be the gifts of St. Nicholas. When the modern stocking came into use, about two hundred years ago, it was substituted for the shoe as a more convenient receptacle, and the custom has become fixed on Christmas day.

The SATURNALIA was a festival observed by the Romans about the middle of December, in honor of the good Saturn, whom Lucian introduces giving an account of the ceremonies observed on this occasion, thus:—"During my whole reign, which lasts but one week, no public business is done; there is nothing but drinking, singing, playing, creating imaginary kings, placing servants with their masters at table. There shall be no disputes or reproaches, but the rich and poor, masters and slaves, shall be equal."

The Persians, as ancient writers inform us, used to teach their sons to ride, pay their debts, and to tell the truth.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I like THE INDEX very much, and shall certainly renew my subscription. Though I am but nineteen years old, I have been a member of a Baptist Church four years, and have always been greatly interested in religious questions. When I first joined the church, I would always meet the minister with a host of questions concerning the Bible-ideas, to which my reason would not be reconciled; and never having been satisfactorily answered, they proved to be nest-eggs of heresy, and for the past two years I have been gradually led to a knowledge of the truth as it is, not in Orthodoxy, but in Reason and Conscience. Hawthorne says the old and tattered garments of antiquity will not be changed for a whole new suit, but will or do renew themselves by patch-work. Now I for one want this radical move to be a good large patch on the soul of the times; and let us all see to it, that the patch is so put on that it will wear well. But I will not bore you with a long letter; perhaps you will bear with me if I send you another letter some time on this cause, to which I would gladly devote my whole life."

"Do not get discouraged; things are moving forward slowly but surely. Fossilization is crumbling. The blood quickens. When we grope in the darkness of doubt as to the success of our undertakings, the light may be breaking so far above us that our material eyes cannot penetrate to the great light. I sent two copies of THE INDEX to a friend, and lo! the seed fell on good ground, taking root, and bearing blossoms of hope and fruit. The latter I enclose to you with these comforting words,—'Be of good cheer!' for I will let fly other doves, hoping they may return like their mates, bearing olive branches also."

"According to promise, I send you two more names for THE INDEX, and hope they will come in time for next week's issue. I very much wish, though, you would send last week's paper for a commencement, on account of the 'Revival' article in it, which I know will be appreciated by both of the subscribers. I have been very fortunate in getting names of intelligent persons and those holding good positions in society, and I am quite proud of my achievements, but I know I can do better if I try hard."

"The article on 'Efficacy of Prayer' is excellent; in fact, the whole number is good. I do not like to say better than previous numbers. But I can say one thing—you are not crankfishing."

"Please send me your paper, THE INDEX. Let me be frank and say I have not the slightest sympathy with your religious views. We, however, like to read your paper. Whatever is human is interesting."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings at 10½ o'clock A. M., Sunday, in Daniels' Block, corner of Summit and Jefferson streets. The public are invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—Meetings at 7½ o'clock P. M., Sunday, in the same place. Subject of discussion for Dec. 25:—"Why are Liberals less willing than Conservatives to make Sacrifices for their Ideas?"

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry street; in Campbell's Block, St. Clair street; and at the Oliver House.

CHRISTMAS.

O blessed eve, pregnant with God's great love!
 O lapse of fateful hours! O happy earth,
 That thou shouldst travail in such wondrous birth
 As shook with awe the amazed Heaven above!
 With kindred throes thy sister Ether strove;
 And, heralding its Lord, the new-born Star,
 Than Sirius' orb intense intenser far,
 O'er night's swart brow its web of radiance wove.
 Hark to the sacred anthem choired on high,
 That through the firmament's vast-vaulted fane
 Poured rapturous floods of golden harmony;
 Till reverent Echo caught the ecstatic strain,
 And Earth conspired to swell the adoring cry—
 "Glory to God! Peace and good will to men!"

The Index.

DECEMBER 24, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our back numbers is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

To each and all of our friends, we wish most heartily a "Merry Christmas!"

We will send THE INDEX, for the month of January, 1871, to any one who would like to examine the paper, FREE. Our subscribers will please send us the names of any such.

The Watchman and Reflector thinks THE INDEX is "nothing." The blunder is easily explained. The Watchman very unreflectingly looked into the Reflector, and mistook what he saw for THE INDEX.

Mr. Joel Moody, an article by whom will be found today among our "Communications," is lecturing in Kansas with great acceptance, if we can judge by the Topeka papers. His subject is—"The Reformer." Committees in that neighborhood seeking to engage liberal lecturers may address him at present at Topeka, care of Crane & Byron.

The approach of the end of the year will, we hope, remind many of our subscribers that their term of subscription expires with it. It will accommodate us all, if those who design to renew their subscription will do so at once, saving themselves interruption in receipt of the paper, and saving us unnecessary trouble with our mail-list. The kind words we have received from so many of our subscribers encourage us to hope that few, if any, will wish to discontinue.

NIGHT SCHOOLS.

Last winter, as the readers of THE INDEX are aware, a Free Evening School for men and boys and an afternoon Industrial School for girls were sustained for several months with most encouraging success. They were started by ladies and gentlemen of the First Independent Society, but received generous aid from the Board of Education and prominent citizens of Toledo. So gratifying were the results of this experiment, and so strong was the proof of the necessity of such schools in the city, that at the earliest day practicable the original friends of the movement took measures to re-open free Evening Schools for the winter. Relying upon the friendly interest of the public in an enterprise of such proved utility, they obtained numerous signatures to a petition to the Board of Education, requesting the latter to appropriate funds for the support of Evening Schools, and to assume direction of them.

To this petition the Board made a prompt and generous response. They appointed Gen. C. W. Hill (Chairman of the Board), M. Shoemaker, Esq., and Dr. V. Braun, a Select Committee to act in the matter. At a special meeting of the Independent Society, held at the house of Mr. Guido Marx on the first of December, a note was received from Gen. Hill, requesting the appointment by the Society of a Committee of six to co-operate with the Select Committee above mentioned. Miss Henrietta Angier, Miss L. R. Robbins, Mrs. H. E. Howe, Mr. Guido Marx, Mr. H. L. Holloway, and F. E. Abbot, were accordingly appointed.

Three meetings of these two Committees were held forthwith (Dec. 3rd, 6th, 9th,) in Drummond Block. The Select Committee, by a very courteous vote, enlarged itself by the addition of the six persons just mentioned, as a joint committee of superintendence for the winter. To the appeals which were immediately issued (to be found on a previous page) fifty-five teachers responded by volunteering for the work proposed. The boys' school was opened Wednesday evening, Dec. 14, with about seventy pupils.

No teacher is expected to attend more than one evening a week, though several have offered to attend two or even three times. There is little doubt that the number of pupils will rapidly increase; and the prompt enlistment of so many teachers makes it almost certain that the supply will be equal to the demand.

To the Board of Education, and especially to the Select Committee appointed by it, the thanks of the entire community are justly due. Nothing could be more encouraging to the friends of the movement than the sympathy and energetic assistance given by these gentlemen; and we trust that the public will appreciate their labors. If a permanent institution for educating those whom the hard necessities of toil have debarred from all opportunities of acquiring the elements of knowledge shall grow out of the seed thus planted in hope and faith,—if the night schools shall become a part of the regular school system,—who can doubt that "every dollar thus invested will save ten dollars hereafter," by preventing pauperism and crime? Such schools are a better protection against social disorder than courts or jails. No one who sees the eagerness to learn which is manifested by this class of pupils can help rejoicing over the opportunity thus opened to them. Would that it might be offered in every city of the land!

A VITAL DIFFERENCE.

An interesting letter addressed to Mr. Potter by Keshub Chunder Sen, of India, will be found in the "Department of the Free Religious Association." This native reformer, whose late visit to England attracted so much attention, is desirous of "mutual intercourse and co-operation" between the Association and the Brahmo Somaj. While most cordially reciprocating his brotherly sentiments, we feel constrained to point out an important difference in their bases of organization. The Brahmo Somaj, as its name implies, has a Theistic creed as its bond of union; the F. R. A. has its bond of union in the simple principle of Freedom in Fellowship. Theism as a creed, is in our judgment little better than Tritheism. The American represents a broader idea than the Indian Association; and while its members cannot but feel the liveliest sympathy for the Hindureform movement, they would be false to their own fundamental ideas, if they abandoned the principle of absolute freedom of thought for any creed, however true in itself, however precious to their own individual sets. The friendliest and most brotherly relations should subsist between the F. R. A. and the Brahmo Somaj; but we must keep clearly before the public the all-important distinction between creeded and creedless organization, and forbear, out of sentiment or sentimentality, to swamp Free Religion in "mush of concessions."

Mr. H. L. Green, the indefatigable and efficient Secretary of the Syracuse Radical Club, sends us the most encouraging count of its doings. Its Reading Room is stocked with liberal papers and periodicals, open every day and evening in the week, and provided with sufficient funds to secure its existence two years, at least. The club holds discussions every Thursday evening, and secures lectures on Sunday—Mr. C. B. Mills recently reading a fine one on "The New Spirit of the Age." Every town of considerable size ought to do as well; and in every village ought to have its faithful dozen to work for liberal thought and prosocial life.

The Washington (D. C.) conoclast, which has been heretofore managed by the National Liberal Reform League generally, will be henceforth under the particular management of one of its members, whose name is not given. It is evidently in the hands of thinking and reading people, and have been struck with the great excellence of the number for December 1, in point of general thought, pure English, and good taste. The new editor understands how to belabor without being coarse, and makes a paper which, though very small, is very interesting. The price is only fifty cents a year. Address P. O. Box 190, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Howe's circle for the New York meeting in furtherance of a "World's Peace Congress" have been elected. Who that has a heart can help wish well to such an enterprise? Yet who has a head can help thinking that the absolute condition of peace among the nations is the cessation of ambitious aggression. To that end, friends of peace, direct your efforts. Strive to overthrow the world's tyrannies, and kindle in all hearts the spirit of freedom, justice, and reverence for man's rights. All else is windy declamation.

THE DOCTRINE OF "TOTAL DEPRAVITY," CONSIDERED FROM THE EVANGELICAL STAND-POINT.

MR. ABBOT:—It is with pleasure that I accept your courteous invitation to respond to the queries appended to my late communication in your paper—in other words, to discuss, from the evangelical stand-point, the so-called doctrine of "Total Depravity." In accepting this invitation, permit me to say, I am aware that you are according me a privilege that would hardly be granted you in any of our religious papers. It seems that the Milwaukee Index, while rudely and unsparingly assailing you, could not yet afford to quote your words. It seems to me he was either bound to do this or say nothing. I cannot understand how a Christian editor, because a Christian and an editor, is under any obligation to be ungenerous or unfair. The spirit of the Gospel is that of equity itself. Some of the subscribers of the Independent growl because, under the head of "Current Religious Views," the opinions of all classes of believers and of all sorts of unbelievers are given in their authors' own words. I have no sympathy whatever with this timorous policy. I believe it were much better to act as though we had some confidence in the truth, believed it could stand alone, and could bear its own weight. How ridiculous this weak trepidation, this quaking in our orthodox shoes, although several million strong, when, as one of your correspondents puts it,—"A baker's dozen of unorganized Free Religionists train a solitary siege-gun upon our Malakoff!" There is too much truth in the allegation you make that orthodoxy acts as though it was somewhat ashamed of itself in these days, or as if conscious of some mortal weakness,—seems to be so nervously sensitive to opposition or attack as to indicate anything but a quiet consciousness of the impregnable strength of its position. In justice, however, to these hunters of heresy and nervous guardians of orthodoxy, it should be said that they consider that there is infinitely more at stake than you do in connection with this matter of the propagation of religious opinions. They consider that, especially in the case of the young, the ignorant—those whose minds are immature or untrained to thought—their immortal souls are in peril. You, as I understand it, believe no such thing. In your estimation the embracing of an error, or a false doctrine, even though it be a material one, is attended by no specially fatal consequences. The orthodox man, however, believes that unbelief on what he considers vital points is attended by immortal perils and irretrievable losses. This will go far to explain the nervousness and timidity above referred to—this seeming illiberality and narrowness on the part of orthodoxy. Though it does not altogether excuse, it does yet partially justify its want of that magnanimity and breadth of charity which should indeed ever characterize Christian manners and Christian thought.

I am, then, to say something about the doctrine of "Total Depravity" and its effects upon the minds of those who truly believe it. In what may be offered, it shall be my object to get at the thing itself, whatever it may be, regardless of any popular or time-honored modes of expressing it—to define its substance, while stripping it of its withered and wasted husk. And here it may, it must be admitted that, though doctrines themselves may not change, their forms of expression—the methods of defining, interpreting, expounding, or applying them—do inevitably undergo changes from time to time. Hence the folly of any stereotyped symbol, any elaborate creed that is to answer our purposes for all time. An unwillingness to recognize this law on the part of the Christian Church has led to precisely those absurdities of conduct you hardly exaggerated in a late editorial:—"It (orthodoxy) seeks nervously to hide its defection from its own standards under noisy protestations of fidelity to them. Old phrases are retained, but emptied of old meanings. Old creeds are loudly reiterated, while old doctrines are quietly discarded." This tendency to hold on with such fearful tenacity to "old phrases," after they are emptied of their original meaning,—to cling to certain forms of expression long after their soul, their real life and power, have gone out of them,—is, I venture to think, a culpable weakness. To many how preposterous it seemed, when, a few years ago, the representatives of the most powerful denomination in New Eng and went down to Plymouth Rock, and for the sake of a sort of historical consistency re-affirmed their allegiance to the old Westminster platform, when not one in a hundred of those ministers ever intended to preach the cardinal, distinguishing doctrines of that platform! Unequal to the great occasion, those divines could not sufficiently emancipate themselves from this rooted prejudice in favor of ancient forms, to affirm their belief unequivocally in a living tongue—in the language of to-day. Forms will perish. They are human. But the truth abides. That is divine.

"The eternal years of God are hers."

And he is thrice, and wilfully blind, who does not see that, while the substance of evangelical faith, in all its material features, is still just as firmly and loyally adhered to by the church as ever it was, modes of interpretation, forms of expression, habits of thought and feeling in regard to that faith, are today no longer what they were yesterday. In speaking upon the subject of "Total Depravity," then, I shall attempt to represent the matter (as nearly as I can) as it exists in the thought and convictions of the live men of the church of to-day.

"Total Depravity." This phrase is not found in the Bible. It is one of the "stock-phrases of a sect," and, as such, it should have been abandoned long ago. It never fell from the lips of Jesus. Paul never once employed it. The New Testament is not responsible for it. A proper Bible-Religion can in no wise reasonably be held responsible for it. Many repudiate it. Nay, most evangelical teachers at the present time discard it. They discard it because it is misleading. Total Depravity!—on its face, how hideous its aspect! Is it a wonder men have revolted from the picture? This conception of unregenerate Human Nature will do to go with other atrocities of Calvinism—of Calvinism, mind you, not the Gospel itself—such, for example, as its ancient representations of the divine character, and of the doom of the lost,—representations which men ought to hate, and which Methodists have always been as ready to reprobate, denounce, and stigmatize as outrageous, as the rankest Liberal or Radical. But because such odious and unwarrantable representations of Bible truth have been made, is the truth itself to be considered as invalidated, any more than true science should be considered as unworthy of our confidence, because of the vagaries, the senseless assumptions and conjectures, the insane ravings, and superstitious notions, that have from time to time been put forth in its name? I have said that this phrase, "Total Depravity," is misleading. Evidence of this we have in the fact that not one in fifty of those who contemptuously fling this phrase in our teeth seem to have the slightest idea of what, at least at the present time, is intended to be expressed by it. Who can ever estimate the amount of misapprehension, mischief, needless controversy, and unnecessary bitterness, that has been occasioned by the unauthorized use of this unfortunate phrase!

Yet while, as we have seen, this speculative dogma of man seems to embody a conception which we instinctively repel as extravagant and unjust, and plainly contrary to what we know of the many graces and virtues of unconverted men, it cannot be denied that it stands for what is considered a fundamental truth in connection with the Christian scheme. Let us try and find out just what that truth is. While often used so as, in reality, to express what is false, it may be that this dogma is also capable of being so stated as to express that which is true.

1. The term "total" is intended to apply simply to man's religious nature. As popularly understood, this dogma signifies this,—that man, naturally, is utterly without power to lift himself to the conscious knowledge of God's love. More philosophically expressed,—without the quickening influence of the Divine Spirit, voluntarily sought, there is no life in the moral faculty—no sight in the spiritual eye (Faith)—no hearing in the spiritual ear—no sensibility in the spiritual nature. As the result of this, there is no joyful, inspiring sense of God; there is no loyalty to him—no supreme love to him. On the other hand, there is insubordination, yes, "total" insubordination, to divine control. A person may be nobly and beautifully endowed and developed socially and domestically, on the plane of secularity; and yet, so far as God is concerned, have a hard and "carnal" heart—a heart which "is in enmity against God." He may not be conscious of that enmity. He will not, until God manifests himself to him as a governing, restraining power, any more than your child can be conscious of its latent and fierce opposition to your will so long as permitted to have its own way. Nor need this slumbering enmity to God necessarily prevent the cultivation of social graces, and even very many noble qualities of head and heart. A man may be a very amiable man, exemplary in all social and domestic relations, and yet be a Tory, or a Rebel, for all that,—may yet bitterly and relentlessly hate and assail the government. Still, as were natural, this paralysis of the spiritual or Faith faculty—of this distinctively God-ward side of our nature—tends greatly to paralyze also or pervert the other and lower and otherwise comparatively unimpaired faculties of our being; so that, as a matter of fact, men as a rule incline to evil rather than good, our average humanity vastly preponderating in the direction of vice.

Now, then, there may be a difference of opinion as to the propriety of representing this human disability as "total depravity"—a phrase that might, with the utmost propriety, be also applied to the infernal demon in hell. It may be doubted whether the foregoing is a correct representation of the facts in the case. Yet I am quite certain that this is just precisely what is meant by the dogma in question. Now, then, is there anything in the doctrine thus defined inconsistent with correct views of self-respect—anything to lead a man to feel ashamed of himself—any farther than he is consciously blame-worthy for living beneath his privilege, or for wilful neglect of duty?

2. A few distinguished teachers in the evangelical ranks consider depravity simply as weakness, unripeness, want of development, disorder, disease. Prominent among these are Henry Ward Beecher and Dr. Horace Bushnell. Here the term "total" can only fairly apply to infants,—they being regarded as "totally depraved," only in the sense of being utterly undeveloped—"very far gone from original righteousness," only in the sense of being very low down in the scale of development. Here, moreover, there is properly no "Fall"—no element of malignity. Yet these teachers hold fast to their evangelical position by insisting that true or satisfactory development can never be reached without voluntarily sought and personally experienced help from God. No happy, contented, well-rounded or balanced development, particularly of man's higher, nobler, spiritual nature,—that part of him by which he holds sweet commerce with the skies,—can be realized without faith in Christ; that is, such a union of the soul to God, through Christ, as brings that soul habitually, permanently, rejoicingly under the influence of considerations drawn from another world. And this is "Salvation,"—the entering of the soul fully into the divine order—having God, as it were, flowing through it by his own perfect will, "even as he sways to unsinning obedience the tides of the sea or the rounds of the stars."

What is there specially objectionable about such a doctrine of depravity as this? Man is feeble, comparatively helpless. He needs the assistance of the God who made him to enable him to rise to the top of all his glorious possibilities. The Gospel shows him how he may place his hand in God's, and thenceforth joyfully, victoriously walk in the "path of the just,"—a way that to his opening vision and inspired and glowing heart grows "brighter and brighter even unto the perfect day."

R. H. HOWARD.

["Total Depravity," in the system of genuine orthodoxy, is that utter ruin and depravation of human nature on account of which God condemns all men without exception to an everlasting hell, unless they escape this horrible doom by availing themselves of the "Atonement of Christ." This "Depravity," without which there is no need of any "Atonement," Mr. Howard has very effectually rationalized away.—Ed.]

THE VOYAGE OF DEATH.

[Our friend, Seth Hunt, of Northampton, Mass., whose name is familiar to the advocates of every good cause at the East, sends us a copy of his remarks at the funeral of George B. Eustis in that town, Jan. 19, 1870. They were first printed in the Northampton Free Press, and seem to us so beautiful that we cannot withhold them from our readers. When "laymen" are everywhere able to speak on such occasions such words of real religion, one of the chief reasons for a separate class of "clergymen" will be removed.—Ed.]

Learning that opportunity would be given to any one who chose to make remarks on this occasion, I have placed on paper a few thoughts suggested by the event which has called us together.

Death, more than any other scene in man's history, has been shrouded in gloom and made to serve the ends of superstition. But Paul appears to have had in his mind a state of things in which death would be stripped of its sable vestments and those dread attributes with which ignorance and fear have clothed it, and made no longer a terror and an enemy, but a blessing and a friend. This victory over death, I believe, is to be brought about by increase of knowledge and wiser views of the Divine arrangements. Death is not an arbitrary penal infliction, but the necessary result of physical life. The light of science which, so far as it is true, is a Divine revelation, has already done much to give us the victory over death.

In the first place, it has shown that death is not attended with that physical suffering which is generally supposed to accompany dissolution. So far from being generally painful, there are good reasons for believing it is, at the last, an absolutely pleasurable experience. It is found that, where a bodily disorder has gone to that extent that death must be the final result, the sufferer is gradually and willingly detached from his hold on life, and led to look with comfort on his approaching end.

Another way in which the light of science is overcoming the fear of death is by clearing away the mystery, darkness and uncertainty into which death seems to plunge us. A little child peoples the dark cellar with ghosts and demons; but let his father give him his hand, and he will walk unaffrighted into the imaginary haunt of spectres. So let us take hold of the Divine hand and walk through the valley of the shadow of death, fearing no evil. And this we can do by realizing the great truth, that the same laws run out to the farthest bounds of the universe. God is not one thing here, and another there. Death is not the entrance into eternity. Eternity is here, and eternity is there.

The voyage of Columbus which led to the discovery of America, affords, it seems to me, good illustrations of the false and true ideas of the future state. In the little bark of the great discoverer, were ignorant, and as a consequence, superstitious men. To them the sea ended at the brink of a bottomless abyss, so that if they went on, they imagined the ship would plunge into the blackness of darkness, or a fathomless pit of unknown horrors. Columbus, on the contrary, had grasped the hand of the Heavenly Father, by a knowledge of His laws. The light of science dispelled the darkness with which his men had shrouded the uttermost part of the sea, and he feared no evil. While his men shrank back, he was eager to go forward. He went forward, and the new world was found to be the same as the old, solid and sure; subject to the same laws; blessed with the same Father's care.

Our young brother whose remains lie before us, I have reason to believe, went in the spirit of a Columbus into that new world which lies beyond our vision. Knowing the wisdom and goodness of the Heavenly Parent here, he did not doubt he would find in Him the same attributes there. And these sentiments on the part of his parents and other kindred, I feel assured, largely mitigate the sorrow of their final parting.

RADICALISM.

CASTLETON, ILL., Oct. 23, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—It was by mere chance that I stumbled upon your paper, through what I called at the time a very good advertisement in the columns of the Liberal Christian. In that paper's comment upon THE INDEX and its editor, I was satisfied that I had found something worth supporting, and I must say that I have not yet been disappointed.

This part of God's creation is full of Methodism, and, of course, full of ignorance, superstition, and all the ungodliness consequent upon such a state of existence. But there are signs of progress, nevertheless, and in most communities I presume it to be the same. The gradual in-creeching of Universalism is a slight manifestation of this progress, and the country only needs a little more irrigation to bring forth a harvest of positive radicalism.

It so happens that I am only a poor farmer; but I can love truth just as much as if I were one of the greatest philosophers or statesmen that ever lived. I was not educated while young, simply because my parents did not know their duty. Had they been as radical as I am to-day, I should have received what the world terms a finished education. But the education I did not get; at least it was so thought, and I was left to float hither and thither upon the world's surface, and keep myself from sinking to the bottom. But the world knew nothing of what was then going on within. If it had had eyes, it might have seen Radicalism then, as now. I looked out upon the world, and saw that mankind were given over to inventions of their own. Whatever was done, was done according to system, and I believed that all the denominations were far from the truth, and in a poor way to find it. My radicalism then said to me,—“Wait until your mind is a little more matured, then look into these things.” That radicalism saved me,—saved me from selling myself, body or soul, to any sect or creed or form whatever. He who knows God as the Radical, and the Devil as the Conservative, and who despises the latter as much as he loves the former, what greater radical can there be than he?

One reason why Radicalism is not more generally accepted is that it leaves so little room for speculation. Policy and dishonesty are no friends to the radical portion of mankind. Speculation rules the day, hour and moment. Truth is only served when it will pay best; and if it does not pay, it is thrown overboard as a worthless article.

In my own view, conservatism is nothing but want of reverence for truth. All its reverence is for that which it has already got, and which it says is enough. Its object is to keep upon the safe side always, and trim its course to suit anybody and everybody. In short, it aims simply to please mankind. Its godliness is all put on, and serves the outward God that the multitude has ever sought after, and are seeking to-day.

Material gods have always existed; the worship of idols is nothing new, and has only changed form. “But what can you show for Radicalism?” ask the multitude. I answer, much. Truth and knowledge are diffused by radicalism, which means, simply, deep irrigation, thorough tillage, live work, real life, truth-seeking, and truth-finding. What is there more than this?

Yours truly,

C. W. NEWTON.

“SECOND PLEA FOR NECESSITY AND FREEDOM.”

FRIEND ABBOT:—Man is so closely related to inorganic matter, so rooted in the soil out of which he grows, I do not wonder that the advocates of Necessity hold so firmly to the denial of all Freedom. And on the other hand man being possessed of such mental activities, I do not wonder that the advocates of Freedom hold to the denial of Fate. Fate and Freedom are opposites, yet not incompatible. They are opposite expressions of one force.

The whole question resolves itself into one of Cause and Effect, namely,—Is there such a thing as a free cause? That is, one originating and expressing itself in a particular intelligence. And here there is generally a play upon words. Let us analyze therefore the conclusion of L. T. I. in your issue of October 29., prop. 1, of his PLEA FOR NECESSITY—“Free choice must be a something from nothing.”

Analysis: Choice is a something or a nothing. If nothing, it is not. But it is; not as a negation, but as a positive reality.

Definition: Choice is a mental determination. In the sense of materiality, it is nothing, but in the sense of mentality, it is a thing done or determined. It is not a thing like salt, but a thing like virtue. Virtue is not a negation, a mere non-existence of something, but a reality, a potency, a mover of matter, a force. It has no materiality about it, yet exists as a fact of this world, as truly as the chloride of sodium. The same might be said of Knowledge. It is not made up of atoms, but is a something, a reality, a power; the mover of matter, a force. We can predicate much of knowledge, virtue, choice; very little of matter.

That knowledge, virtue, choice, are causes, perhaps none will deny; but are they ever free causes? To answer this we only have to deal with the word intelligence. Knowledge, virtue, choice, could not exist as free causes without intelligence. Their soul is intelligence. But intelligence is always free; there are no fetters that can bind it to fate. An intelligent choice is always a free choice. There is nothing back of intelligence to cause it; it is the absolute cause itself. Intelligence cannot be originated; it was, and is. It is the original. As well affirm a beginning to Matter and Force. There is no getting behind Intelligence for its cause. It is the crowning attribute of Infinite Force. There are many reasons for this affirmation which space prevents my dwelling upon. I throw it out here for a subject of thought.

Now, choice implies knowledge, conscious thought, prevision; as such it is intelligent force; and it must be a free cause, because intelligence has no antecedents. It has no cause before it. It lies back of, and is independent of all motives, or conditions. True, it is a finite expression of an Infinite Cause, or a spark of Infinite Intelligence with man, but as such, it is identical therewith, and uncaused. All motives lie in the bosom of Intelligence, and are evolved therefrom. Intelligence exists without motives, but no motive can exist or come into existence without Intelligence preceding it.

To say one has choice without freedom, is a contradiction in terms. It is like saying one acts without doing anything, or has conscious thought without knowing it, or that his actions are willed involuntarily. But fated choice negatives all original action; all new mental condition, all variation through design; in short, it negatives all intellectual progress. To prove that man has not freedom as a formative cause, is to prove that man has no choice, nor prevision, and that what the future reveals is all necessitated and must come to pass, not because of man's designs and efforts often to govern future events, but in spite of them. This facts plainly contradict, e. g. those of horticulture and stock-growing. Man can often reveal and absolutely control future events, through design. How, if not free? How, if certain acts of man be not final causes?

So much for Freedom; now a word on Necessity. Action in the animal may not always be intelligent. It may be unconscious, automatic, or the result of habit. Many of our actions are instinctive, or the result of transmitted habit. Herein we are machines. The tendency to like habits of thought and action as exhibited in our ancestors may come to us by proper inheritance; herein we are driven often by an uncontrollable force. But no conscious thought, or intelligence as such, was ever transmitted. The capacity to receive impressions from without, or the tendency to ancestral habit has only been transmitted. In other words: Intelligence comes into us after we are born. No one can transmit Euclid's Elements to his child. Now, we receive the capacity for Intelligence to dwell in, from an aged world of ancestral growth and habit, and as our capacity increases it makes room for a greater indwelling of Intelligence, and in degree, yet not in quality, we also grow in freedom. We are tethered to ignorance with an elastic cord, which we may stretch as we reach out after knowledge. Yet we shall always hobble about the pole of our ignorance, and be free only to the extent of our capacity to receive from the inflowing fountain of Intelligence. And this Intelligence is the uncaused moving cause and part of ourselves. In fact, the more Intelligence we possess, the more there is of us, as free causes.

Your truly,

JOEL MOODY.

MOUND CITY, KANSAS, Nov. 10, 1870.

CHRISTMAS IN NORWAY.—Nowhere, perhaps, is the conventional greeting, “A Merry Christmas,” more appropriate than in Norway. Here the Yule or Christmas is celebrated as a national feast by all the inhabitants, from the poor cotter to the wealthy Udaller.

In the mountain districts especially, this one great holiday of the year is kept with a heartiness and a primitive hospitality unknown in less remote regions. All work is suspended for thirteen days. The entrance of every house is decorated, and the walls of the kitchens are roughly adorned with gaudy pictures, fantastically painted in water colors. Throughout Christmas Eve and Christmas Day the merry-making is entirely domestic, restricted to the members of each family and household. Not even a friendly visit is paid. On the following days the neighbors assemble at each other's houses by turns for carousing. No regular meal is provided, but open house is kept, the table richly spread for all comers. No stranger is allowed to leave the house until he has partaken of the strong Yule ale, which is served in true Norwegian fashion, cask following cask in rapid succession. A sort of recitative is chanted from time to time:

“Let the bowl pass quickly,
Joyfully let it circle
Round the table
Nobly, richly spread.”

On these occasions the servants sit at the same table with the host, his wife and family. All are dressed in their gala attire of rich colored cloth, trimmed with gold and silver braid, the women wearing caps and aprons of brilliant hues.

THE FEAST OF YULE.—Yule, Yool, Iul or Jol is a Gothic word, signifying a “sumptuous treat,” and particularly applied to a religious festival, first among the heathens and afterwards among the Christians. By the latter it was given to Christmas; which is still known under the name of Iul or Yool in Denmark, Norway, Iceland and Sweden. As this feast had originally been dedicated by our heathen ancestors to the sun, their supreme deity, the Christians, for the purpose of engaging the minds of their gentle brethren, celebrated it in memory of Christ.

“I am the Great American Traveller,” said Daniel Pratt, the great American bore, as he entered, uninvited, a certain newspaper office. “Well, travel!” was the sententious and only response of the editor.

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

THE CRIMES OF REPORTERS.

We wish some one would write an essay on the crimes of reporters. We have no room for it here, nor is this exactly the place. The Free Religious Association has not been specially wronged in this respect. Its public meetings have fared as well at the hands of the newspaper press as those of other bodies. It has found not a few reporters thoroughly in sympathy with its principles and aims, and taking special care to present them to the public faithfully. And on the other hand, it has had the common misfortune of being reported by unappreciative, ignorant, and careless men. In a few instances theological prejudice and malice on the part of the reporter have evidently colored his notes.

Usually, however, so far as the Free Religious Association is concerned, ignorance and carelessness in reporters are the faults of which it would complain. And when we consider how many people get their only idea of a public convention or a society through a newspaper report of its proceedings, these faults in reporters may well be called crimes. They are crimes against the public as well as against the meeting or speaker that is thus falsely reported. Prudent people, it is true, who are in the habit of attending public meetings and then reading the accounts of them in the newspapers, learn to put very little trust in newspaper reports of public meetings. But not all people exercise this prudence, or have learned the necessity of caution in reading an ordinary newspaper abstract of a public speaker's remarks. And it is amazing that newspaper men, that even publishers and editors of high repute, should so little feel their responsibility to public speakers and to the public in this part of their work. Men who have no qualifications for the office except a partial knowledge of some system of short-hand writing, are deputed to report an address, (not verbatim but in abstract), which deals with subtle principles, and, perhaps, with personal opinions and character, and which follows a close line of logic. The reporter catches at a few points here and there, which seem to him most substantial, or where perhaps a laugh is raised, and ties them arbitrarily together, and that is his abstract! No wonder that some of the most thoughtful writers and speakers now shrink from addressing any public meeting where reporters are allowed. They feel no assurance that the newspapers will not report them as saying things precisely opposite to what they actually may say.

We have been led to write thus because we have in mind two or three instances where the speakers of the Free Religious Association have been grossly misrepresented by the newspaper reports. At the annual meeting last May one of the Boston newspapers, in attempting to report Mr. Thos. Vickers' address on the Relation of Religion to the State, put into Mr. V.'s mouth, as his own opinions, arguments which he quoted from his opponents on this question to show their absurdity,—among which was a portion of an address which he read from one of the speakers of the Pittsburg Convention, that was held in the interest of amending the U. S. Constitution so as to make it recognize the Christian religion, and which he repeated to expose the dangerous tendency of this movement to a subtle union of church and state. Mr. Vickers' address was perfectly clear on this point. The confusion and absurdity of the report were the result of the reporter's ignorance or carelessness: and yet he made just enough sense not to indicate to any reader who had not heard the address what the blunder was. In a report of one of our Western Conventions Mr. Towne was represented as comparing the Koran with the Bible, and as saying "that of the two he thought the Koran the best." We heard Mr. Towne, and know that, when he spoke of the two books as a whole, he said definitely the very opposite of this. Yet this reported saying, with some others taken apart from the connection in which they were uttered, have been quoted and circulated as evidence of the blasphemy and rapidness of these Western Conventions. We have heretofore given credit to the Western journals as a whole that reported our recent Conventions, for their generosity in space and their general accuracy. But this judgment is to be taken as a comparative one, and as not covering every report that was made. And we wish it distinctly understood that, though the reports of some of the daily papers have been reprinted in THE INDEX, they are not to be considered as official. They give a general idea of what was said and done, but an imperfect one; and in some particulars are far from authentic.

We have spoken only of the ignorance and carelessness of reporters. And these, though in a somewhat figurative sense, sometimes amount to the magnitude of crimes. But we want to add, and with emphasis, though it may not precisely belong here, that professed reports of public meetings are sometimes so malicious in intent as to be libellous, and a fit occasion for invoking the protection of the law, were there any chance of getting the wrong set right in that way. There are newspaper reports of public religious meetings, printed in New York every Monday, which ought to be suppressed by the stern hand of public justice as malignant and criminal defamation of character.

LETTER FROM CHUNDER SEN.

We have just received the following letter from this distinguished reformer of India, which announces his safe arrival in his native land and also his regrets that he could not at this time visit America:—

THE BRAHMO SOMAJ OF INDIA,
CALCUTTA, Oct. 26, 1870.

DEAR BROTHER,—I owe you a hundred apologies for leaving your kind message unanswered so long. In anticipation of your invitation, I had almost made up my mind to visit America after making a short stay in England. But owing to illness and the urgent necessity of prolonging my stay in England and cultivating a deeper intercourse with the leading men of the place with a view to ensure the success of my mission, I was unfortunately compelled to abandon the idea. Nothing, I can assure you, would have gladdened and encouraged me so much as a visit to your great and glorious country; and I would surely have undertaken a voyage across the Atlantic but for the above reasons. Should it please God, I may do so at some future time.

In the meantime accept my warmest thanks for your kind invitation, and my cordial regards for you, the Free Religious Association, and the whole body of liberal thinkers in America. I am sure that in the fulness of time all the great nations in the East and in the West will unite and form a vast Theistic Brotherhood, and I am sure that America will occupy a prominent place in that grand confederation. Let us then no longer keep ourselves aloof from each other, but co-work with unity of heart, that we may supply each other's deficiencies, strengthen each other's hands, and with mutual aid upbuild the House of God. Please take this subject into serious consideration, and let me know if you have any suggestions to make whereby a closer union may be brought about between the Brahmo Somaj and the Free Religious Association,—between India and America,—and a definite system of mutual intercourse and co-operation may be established between our brethren here and those in the New World. Such union is desirable, and daily we feel the need of it more and more. Let us sincerely pray and earnestly labor in order that it may be realized under God's blessing in due time.

With brotherly love,

I am ever yours,

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for IMPURE BLOOD, FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will begin for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts, The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 18th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARPSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y., Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1 69, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

TOLEDO, . . . OHIO.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Those columns of THE INDEX headed DEPARTMENT OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION are edited independently by the Secretary of the Association. The Association is not responsible for anything published in any other part of THE INDEX.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, EDITOR.

TRANSIENT AND PERMANENT.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., Sept. 23, 1866.]

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help."

PSALM CXXI: 1.

It requires but a very brief experience of life to become painfully aware of the instability that pervades all human things. Mutation is forced upon the attention of the most careless and unreflecting. No person can have reached years of maturity whose heart has not been wrung again and again by the stern experience of change. A feeling of insecurity, of half-bewildered expectation of loss, soon comes to associate itself with every possession and enjoyment.

It is curious to observe how differently this feeling affects different characters. One man hastens to make the most of every present delight, and to forget its exceeding brevity, exclaiming,—“Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die!” Another so dreads the extinction of a pleasure, that he forbears to taste it altogether. One man is so greedy to enjoy his cake, that he eats to a surfeit, and must afterwards go hungry; while another hoards it up until it moulds, and so cheats himself out of it altogether.

But however men adapt themselves to the great law of change, the law itself remains unvaried; the only thing that never changes is change itself. The child's home, which seems to him so safe and so fixed a refuge, is changed and at last destroyed by the relentless touch of Time. The brothers and sisters that were his playmates pass out one by one from the shelter of the old roof, scatter to the four corners of the earth, and strike root in new and unfamiliar soil; the parents that once seemed such towers of strength, such mighty bulwarks of protection, become enfeebled by the increasing weight of years, and lean in turn on those that once leaned on them. The friendly faces that smiled on us in our infancy, and were made sacred to us by all the tender associations of childhood and youth, are furrowed by the plough of Time, or, vanishing from earth, shine upon us only in the consecrated picture-gallery of memory. The companions of our early days, whom we remember only as careless and merry partners in our childish sports, meet us unexpectedly on the street-corners, and we see with painful surprise how the cares and anxieties of life have left their wrinkled footprints on the smooth and joyous brow of youth. Some whom we remember only as infants, or children so much younger than ourselves as to be unfitted for our maturer studies or games, startle us now and then into grave reflection by coming before us as equals and fellow-toilers in the more earnest occupations of adult years. Whenever we pause to think a moment on the friends and companions of only a dozen years ago, we feel how swiftly Time's current bears us onward, and how rapidly the shores by which we float are changing day by day.

Nor is our perception of life's changes made less vivid, if from our human associations we turn to our outward surroundings. The places and scenes made dear to us by the memories of childhood change quite as rapidly as the forms that once moved among them. The old homestead seems dwarfed and shrunken,—the doorways lowered, the rooms narrow and contracted, the stair-case shortened and less imposing; repairs and changes have altered the paper, the paint, the whole appearance of the place. Old and well-remembered trees are gone, young saplings have shot up into unfamiliar prominence, the garden has lost its ancient look, woods are cut down, pastures and fields are overgrown with new thickets, new roads are laid out or old ones disused, the old gates and fences are fallen into decay or replaced by others,—in a word, the old homestead is no longer the same, and with a passing pang we note the alterations that we cannot concede to be improvements. The heart is always conservative; it is the head that is radical. But Father Time is quite as busy with Nature as with Man, and leaves his private mark of change on both alike.

But suppose we turn from the scenes and friends of the past, and look inwardly upon ourselves: shall we find that here there are no traces of mutation? Far from it. We can perceive even clearer proof of change in ourselves than in all the world about us. How completely changed are our tastes in ten or twenty years! The books we once read so eagerly have lost their fine flavor, and appear vapid and stale; the amusements that once gave us pleasure have grown flat; the company that once delighted us has become strangely insipid; what once seemed beautiful and elegant now excites a smile. Our opinions,—our whole manner of looking at the world and its pursuits, at life and its experiences, at Nature, Man, and God,—are greatly modified, and perhaps reversed. Every decade of our existence has its own peculiar atmosphere and coloring, and brings great metamorphoses, amounting sometimes to tremendous revolutions, into the sphere of our inward consciousness. Our characters are forever changing, from better to worse or from worse to better; and if we compare our present selves with our selves of only ten years ago, we cannot fail to discover the changes. The difference of development, if nothing else, makes a chasm so wide between our present and our past, that it is almost impossible to re-enter into those vanished states of mind and feeling. Any one who has ever kept a diary, or who stumbles upon an old letter, written several years before by himself to some friend, knows how hard it is to identify that former self with the self of today. “Was it I,” he exclaims, “that wrote those words and felt those emotions?” A deep abyss seems to yawn between then and now; and even imagination, adding her skill to that of memory, cannot throw a bridge across it.

How often have we deceived ourselves in picturing an interview with some friend of the olden time, after a separation of years! In fancy we take up the old friendship just where we dropped it, and please ourselves by dreaming of its continuance as in the days of yore. Nor are we always mistaken; there are friendships that knit us together for all eternity. But too often, if we chance to meet a friend of our childish days, we discover a vast divergence in tastes, characters and sympathies. After exhausting the little fund of common memories, we perceive that there is nothing else in common between us. The intimacy of youth has died a natural death. There has been no estrangement, no disruption, but the course of Time's changes has carried us so far apart, that each now inhabits a different world, and has become a foreigner, a stranger, to the other. Who can repress a sigh at the unwelcome discovery, or escape the conviction that not one only, but that both, have changed? Different interests and aspirations have worked out their appropriate developments, and the result is a dissimilarity in fundamental points that is fatal to perfect sympathy or continued intimacy. Sad as the confession is, we do thus gravitate apart; and only when our friendships are based on that which is eternal and deathless in us,—on those deeper and stronger sympathies which lay hold on the Infinite God and his infinite truth,—can we with wisdom look forward to a future of unbroken love; to a friendship that shall defy the assaults of Time, and over-leap the gulf of death to travel triumphantly the long pathway of Eternity. The great blacksmith, Change, is ever busy at his forge; and if you hope that your friend and you shall indeed love forever, you must let his stalwart and sinewy arm plunge your hearts side by side into the same furnace-heats of divine Aspiration, lay them side by side on the same anvil of deep spiritual Experience, and weld them forever into one while glowing white-hot with the love of God.

Thus it is with our human life. Whether we look within us, or without us, we behold the same silent, perpetual, resistless process of Change. Sometimes it works so gradually, that we scarcely perceive it; we float down the Stream of Time, like a child playing in a boat that has unperceived slipped its moorings, and we take no note of our departure, till we discover suddenly with affright that the anchorage we deemed so secure is left forever far in our rear. Sometimes we watch consciously and regretfully the slow gradations of change, and escape the sharp agony of surprise and dismay by paying the price of a longer and duller pain. Time is as sure to rob us of our treasures as Death himself. The little child that we cherish with such jealous fondness as the very joy and sunshine of our home, is as surely taken from us by the lapse of years as by the quicker stroke of the Death-angel. Take your fill, fond parent, of the tender beauty and sweet grace of your little one,—sate your admiring eyes while you can with the glorious loveliness of childish innocence,—delight your ears ere it is too late with the dear accents of that childish voice; for Time is day by day stealing from you that which enraptures your very soul, and in the grown youth you will see as little of the infantile beauty that you now prize, as if it were wasting away in the narrow house of Death. Not without secret pain will you see the young life disengage itself from yours, exchange the sweet dependence and beauty of childhood for the hardy strength and independence of maturity, and at last bestow on another that supreme affection which, do what you will, you yearn to retain. Take comfort, poor bereaved father or mother,—the great sorrow that rent your heart in one fierce agony has saved you many a lesser pang; the little one you laid away with so many tears is all your own now; the cruel fingers of Time will never mar the sweetness of the image you now cherish in your heart of hearts, and the beautiful memory of that childish form will be yours, unchangingly, until God gives it back to you in greater beauty still. The image of a dead child never grows old. One great bitterness you are spared,—the bitterness of seeing the unutterable beauty of childhood perishing daily before your eyes.

Disguise it as we may, or meet it with what alleviations we can, the great law of change spreads a shade of sorrow, diffuses a pensive and melancholy mist, over the whole of human life. We see the transformations of Time sometimes with joy, and quite as often with sadness. Often,—O how often!—we cling to that which is perishing with great and passionate desire. Despite the daily compensations, there is deep pathos and pain in daily loss. Our pos-them—none to mourn their loss. The profound disquisitions of Sir William Hamilton must be regarded as their last triumph for all time; while the vigorous but unsuccessful effort of Cousin to extract from their vast accumulations an eclecticism adequate to the demands of the Nineteenth Century affords ample proof that the world has outstripped them in its march and left them behind to take their places among the relics of antiquity.

The rising school of philosophy, as distinguished from practical scientific labor, and the one which may be said to have already succeeded the French, German, and Scottish schools of metaphysics, is that which for a better name is styled the Positive. Deriving its principles from the teachings of Bacon, Galileo, Newton, Franklin, and Humboldt, it had an illustrious founder in Auguste Comte, and is to-day illuminated and adorned by the intellects of John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer. Darwin, Buckle, and Lyell labored in its ranks, as do now Huxley, Tyndall, and a great number of other distinguished scientists and thinkers in Europe and America. We have already laid before our readers the fundamental principles of this new school of philosophy, as laid down by its founder, and its chief exponents. It remains to add, that besides being scientific in its methods and rational in its doctrines, it is eminently practical in its objects and its results.

Its aims are all utilitarian, and its principles humanitarian. It is neither dogmatic nor visionary, but liberal and exact. Taking nature as its only source of information, and the phenomena of the universe as the material for its deductions, it seeks, in the observation of their uniformities in the present, to trace all things back to their true origin in the past, and calculate their true destiny in the future.

In this two-fold view it passes in review all the systems and institutions of man upon the earth; follows them back to their natural source in his remote history, and predicts with all necessary certainty their ultimate collapse or triumph. Premising a reign of law as absolute and certain over the affairs of men and nations as over the movements of the celestial spheres, the new philosophy grapples as successfully with the questions of human society, law, government, morals, and religion as with those of astronomy, chemistry or physics. To reform humanity is the grand object of this system. Its expounders realize their power, by this method, of accomplishing this object; and if his followers do not all avow it as openly and as repeatedly as Comte did, they certainly practise it since his death with equal sincerity and far greater results. They have caught the true inspiration, as their exact inquiries have revealed to them the great and hitherto hidden secret of human progress in the transcendent majesty of knowledge over all other sources for securing this end; and from each and all of the recognized lights of the Positive Philosophy the cry has gone up for more knowledge, better knowledge! Education, and of the true sort, is what they demand, and that for all mankind.

Education is the key-note of the sociological system of this school of philosophers, and they intend to ring the changes upon it till all the world shall be awakened to its incalculable importance.

Such is a brief review of the history, nature, and aim of what we denominate the rising school; and we confess we cannot, as Liberals, ignore the existence or achievements of this noble movement. Its laborers are Liberals in the widest sense, who, in the very act of building a grand structure with knowledge for its corner-stone, are removing in the most effectual manner the rotten timbers of theological error and popular superstition.

RULES OF THE EVENING SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Blade of Dec. 20.]

The Superintendents, to whom was assigned the duty of drawing up rules for the government of the evening schools, direct as follows, viz:

1. The Principals shall have in charge the order and special management of the schools to which they are appointed. They will see that teachers are assigned to tables not provided for by the Superintendents; that pupils applying for admission are promptly introduced to the proper teachers, and made acquainted with the regulations regarding books, &c. They shall have in special custody the books and other material provided by the Committee on Evening Schools, shall see to their sale and distribution either by themselves or by some person immediately under their direction, and shall render an account of all books sold and money received, and pay over such money to the Superintendent for the evening, each week, and shall carry out all regulations prescribed by the Committee and Superintendent.

2. Pupils are expected to furnish themselves with the books and materials prescribed by the Committee if they can.

Such books and materials can be purchased of the Principals of the schools at the same prices paid for them by the Committee, which in case of books, is understood to be 25 per cent less than the publishers' price list.

3. In case pupils present themselves without books, the Principal, on application of the teacher of such pupils, shall provide the books and materials needed, and during the last minutes of the session the teachers shall collect such books and materials and deliver them to the Principal. All books or other articles, when not in use, shall be in the cupboards provided therefor, and shall be under lock and key.

4. Pupils shall maintain order and quiet during the whole of each session. They shall, on entering the rooms, pass immediately to their respective tables, and shall not leave their seats, except by permission of the Principals.

5. Until further notice, the following order of exercises shall be observed:

7 to 7:10. Distribution of books.

7:10 to 8. Arithmetic.

8 to 8:25. Writing on slates or otherwise.

8:25 to 8:55. Reading and Spelling.

8:55 to 9. Collecting books, &c., by teachers, and collecting reports by principals.

9. Dismission.

GUIDO MARX,
E. W. LENDERSON, } Supts.
D. F. DeWOLF,

INSTRUCTORS IN EVENING SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Blade of Dec. 17.]

As the best arrangement practicable, for the present term, four evening schools are appointed to be held until the middle of March next, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week.

A school for men and boys over the United States Express office, in Daniels' Block; and a school for women and girls in Scott's Block on Cherry street, in Campbell's Block on St. Clair street, and at the Oliver House, will be maintained.

MONDAY EVENINGS.

The Monday evening schools will be under the general direction of Col. D. F. DeWOLF, of our City Schools, as Superintendent. The teachers for Monday evenings will be as follows:—

Cherry Street Girls' School—Mr. R. M. Streeter, Principal; Mrs. R. M. Streeter, Miss Josie E. Bruce, Miss Ida Plessner, and Miss Mary E. Law.

St. Clair Street Girls' School—Miss L. R. Robbins, Principal; Mrs. H. E. Howe, Mrs. Eliza Marx, and Miss Laura Kraus.

Summit Street Boys' School—Mr. A. A. McDonald, Principal; Miss Rebecca Williams, Miss Sophie Commager, Miss Hattie Commager, Miss Emma DeWOLF, Miss Alice Wagner, Mr. A. T. Stebbins, Mr. E. Harnot, Mr. Avery S. Hill, Mr. J. V. Owen, and Mr. Owen, Jr.

Fifth Ward Girls' School—Mrs. Daniel Segur, Principal; Mrs. E. Kissinger, Mrs. Cyrus Breed, Mr. Byron E. Ritchie, and Mr. William K. Smith.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS.

The Wednesday evening schools will be under the general direction of Mr. E. W. LenderSON, Auditor of this county, as Superintendent, who has had much successful experience as a Teacher and Superintendent of Public Schools.

The teachers for Wednesday evenings will be as follows:—

Cherry Street Girls' School—Miss Henrietta J. Angier, Principal; Miss Jennie Brownlee, Miss Amelia Morton, Miss Nellie Baldwin, and Miss Buck.

St. Clair Street Girls' School—Miss C. S. Forsyth, Principal; Miss Eliza W. Fitch, Miss Clara Marx, Miss Mary Beatty, and Miss Ella Beatty.

Summit Street Boys' School—Mr. John Barton, Principal; Mr. John Klag, Mr. Gustavus Wittstein, Mr. A. E. Macomber, Mr. A. T. Stebbins, Mr. Andrew Snell, Miss Ella Hall, Miss Abby Eastman, and Miss Betty Marx.

Fifth Ward Girls' School—Mr. A. M. Stem, Principal; Miss Kate Shoemaker, and Mr. Edmund Lorenz.

FRIDAY EVENINGS.

The Friday evening schools will be under the general direction of Mr. Guido Marx, as Superintendent; and the teachers for Friday evenings will be as follows:—

Cherry Street Girls' School—Mr. George B. Brown, Principal; Miss Florence Hooper, Miss Mary Jaquett, and Miss Jennie Gilchrist.

St. Clair Street Girls' School—Mrs. S. R. L. Williams, Principal; Mrs. John T. Newton, Mrs. Dr. Valentine Braun, and Miss Annie Mott.

Summit Street Boys' School—Mr. S. E. Seagrave, Principal; Miss Sibyl Williams, Miss Ella Hall, Miss Betty Marx, Miss Alice Wagner, Miss Otten, Mr. John Klag, Mr. A. R. Seagrave, Mr. H. L. Holloway, Mr. J. V. Owen, and Mr. Owen, Jr.

Fifth Ward Girls' School—Mr. E. W. E. Koch, Principal; Miss Calista Fay, and Miss Julia Bodley.

The rooms are to be warmed, lighted, and open at 7 P. M. Principals are to be present at the opening and remain until 9 P. M., when the rooms will be closed. Teachers and pupils should be in their places and at their work within ten minutes after 7 P. M.

Teachers finding from any cause that they must be unavoidably absent at the opening of a session to which they are assigned, will send early written notice thereof to the Principal of the room, so that the vacancy may be provided for.

Those interested are advised to cut out this list and preserve it until the end of the term.

In behalf of the Committee.

THE TRICHINA SPIRALIS.

THE TRICHINA SPIRALIS, OR PORK-WORM.—Perhaps it is not generally known that the much talked of trichina spiralis, or pork-worm, was first discovered in America by Dr. R. C. Kendall, of Philadelphia, Pa., with that American instrument known as the Craig Microscope, costing only $3.00, after repeated failures to discover the worm with an imported microscope, costing $55.00, "of feeble power and less reliable." Dr. Kendall says: "It is not recorded that any one had discovered the pork pest earlier than the date of my discovery. If not, then they were first found under an American microscope; and so much for the skill and ingenuity of American mechanism."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"By a mere accident I have come across your Nos. 1 and 14. Having been absent from the United States for some nine years, I have not kept up with the religious advances of the day. Educated a Calvinist, and in the school of old orthodoxy, I have believed many precepts for no other reason than their being a part of the 'creed.' My views have been materially changed on many points of so-called 'faith,' and I wish to examine the principles as set forth in THE INDEX. Enclosed please find $3.04, for which please send to me Volume 1 from Jan. 1, 1870, to Dec. 31, 1870. I ask for the back numbers with a view to an examination seriatim of your principles. The article in No. 14 on the religion of Mr. Lincoln is valuable. Please mail to my address per U. S. Mail via San Francisco." [From Shanghai, China.]

—"I would cheerfully respond to the appeal of your 'Private Circular' in one of the ways indicated, if either were possible in this region. As it is not, I do the next best thing that is possible to me, and remit enclosed three dollars, to be used in any way you may judge best in furtherance of your expressed designs,—and not at all to be considered a 'personal favor, or an act of charity.' I view THE INDEX as a messenger before the face of Truth to prepare the way for His Lordship's advent. I may send you occasionally the address of one or more that I esteem capable of appreciating your efforts and paper, to whom you can send a sample copy. Might it not be well to attach a printed slip to sample copies, saying,—"Sent by request of a friend, hoping you may be sufficiently interested to become a subscriber."

—"On preparing a file of THE INDEX, I am unable to find No. 33, and conclude that either I have never received it or it was mislaid in my absence. If you can help me to it, I shall be thankful. If I was sure that words of congratulation and commendation might not seem trivial and burdensome to one who holds THE INDEX with such unerring forecast in delicate but determined grasp, I would add some testimony in the belief that you have established a power mighty for the hastening of a new era. I am not a pen-skilled critic, but I have no word of fault to find with THE INDEX, and have regretted many adverse criticisms which you have done well to publish. Let me too thank you for THE INDEX. I would do more if I could."

—"You already have my name for the bound volume of your most excellent paper, but I need it weekly, and if you will please send it, beginning with the number containing your recent discourse to the Spiritualists (I do not remember the date and have not the paper), I will remit the pay with the volume, whatever it may be."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The Club will meet regularly on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock, in the same place. Subject of discussion for January 1, same as for December 25.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry street; in Campbell's Block, St. Clair street; and at the Oliver House.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.—The Editor of THE INDEX acknowledges with great pleasure the receipt of $25, for the purchase of books for the Cherry street female school, from Mrs. J. W. Scott, of Toledo.

Also, the receipt of $5 from K. N. as a Christmas present to Austin Kent, East Stockholm, N. Y.

DONATIONS.—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION acknowledge gratefully the receipt of the following donations:—

Poetry.

TO A BIRD OF PASSAGE.

I saw thee guide thy rapid flight
Along the azure sky,
Then on a crested wave alight,
Bathing thee where it sparkled bright,
And soar again on high.

Onward to some sweet distant isle
Is bent thy trackless way,
Where fruits and flowers forever smile,
And soft and balmy airs beguile
The fears of thy decay.

How gladly would I fly with thee,
And deem my lot were blest,
Could I thus mount on wing so free,
To share thy flight o'er land and sea,
And share with thee thy rest!

The Index.

DECEMBER 31, 1870.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Enough orders for the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 have been received to ensure its issue at the end of the year. The republication of our back numbers is already commenced; and the promised index is in process of preparation, to be made a part of the last number of the year. Subscribers for the volume will oblige us by now forwarding the price ($2.50), together with their address, plainly written, in full—post-office, county, and State,—in order to ensure safe delivery. When the two hundred and fifty copies have been all ordered, it will be thenceforward absolutely impossible to furnish a complete file for the year.

THE INDEX FOR 1871.

With the present number of THE INDEX, the "Department of the Free Religious Association" will be discontinued, for reasons assigned by Mr. Potter in his valedictory. To Mr. Potter himself we desire to express the warmest and most heartfelt thanks for the generous co-operation and admirable ability with which he has conducted this department of the paper during the past year. If our readers share our own sentiments in the matter, they have felt nothing but absolute and unalloyed satisfaction in his work; and the numerous expressions of this feeling, unaccompanied by a single expression of a contrary feeling, which have come to us in our correspondence, are the best possible evidence of a delicate task most conscientiously and successfully performed. We do not see how any noble man or woman can read his closing words to-day without profound respect, and a warmer feeling still, for the brain and heart from which they come. They make us proud indeed to call such a man our friend.

But we rejoice that the discontinuance of the official "Department" does not mean the loss of Mr. Potter's invaluable assistance. Under a new arrangement, the aid of Mr. Potter, Mr. Frothingham, Col. Higginson, and Mr. Hallowell has been generously promised as EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS for the coming year; and the list may be enlarged hereafter. These gentlemen are all officers of the Free Religious Association; but they will write only in their individual capacity. It is mutually understood that this new arrangement leaves absolute liberty to each Editorial Contributor to express himself in his own way, no one being in the slightest degree responsible for any utterances but his own; and we wish to emphasize the fact that no one of them must be held by the public to sympathize with the Editor's opinions or position any further than such sympathy is directly expressed. We have not sought to strengthen this position by the influence of numbers; and in order to remove from our collaborators the restraints even of a supposed courtesy, we wish to say at the outset that we invite them to state any possible dissent from our own opinions with absolute freedom. What we hope from this new arrangement is to make THE INDEX more broadly, and therefore more truly, representative of the free religious movement than ever before; and this hope can only be realized by securing interpretations of this movement from the greatest possible variety of standpoints.

In addition to this enlargement of the editorial department of the paper, we expect to receive valuable assistance in other ways from well-known writers. Our department of "Communications," to which we attach great value, will, we doubt not, be as well sustained hereafter as heretofore. Though we are not able to enlarge the paper at present, we are the less anxious to do so since the majority of our subscribers seem to prefer it in its present form and size. Returning most grateful acknowledgements for the help so kindly rendered us from all quarters, and congratulating our friends on the success thus far achieved, we look forward cheerfully to the work before us, and wish the happiest of New Years to each and all.

RADICAL INDIFFERENTISM.

A subscriber to THE INDEX writes, from Iowa to a friend in this city, by whose permission we take a text for a few brief reflections:—

"Two-thirds of the best educated men of our place are liberal, but they have not interest enough in the cause to do anything; and they continue supporting the old orthodox churches in which they do not believe."

The same is true, unquestionably, all over the country; and nothing, in our opinion, does more to retard the true advancement of the community than the apathy here described of those upon whom the promotion of it devolves. Putting aside all cases in which this course is due to purely cowardly or selfish motives (and we are sorry to believe them very numerous), we think that all those persons who adopt such a policy from conscientious motives commit very grave mistakes.

1. They neglect the duty of helping others to the freedom from superstition which they themselves enjoy. Whatever the motive, it is melancholy enough to see men shutting up their light in a dark lantern, which illuminates their own pathway, but leaves their neighbors to stumble in the night. If they do this because they believe the brilliancy of their own particular taper is so great as to injure the eyes of their fellow-citizens, and they therefore conceal its rays out of pure philanthropy, one can but regret the enormous self-conceit which such a wild hallucination demonstrates. If a few are dangerously dazzled by our radiance, let us credit them with sense enough to turn their heads and look another way. But let us not be so puffed up by egotism as to fancy we are bright enough to put out the eyes of all-creation. If we have any light, we may be sure there are enough around us to need it all, and more than we can furnish. The only noble course is to give as we have received, and neither quench nor hide our candle through an absurd tenderness for the optic nerves of our neighbors.

2. Such persons help directly to perpetuate and increase the harmful superstitions of their time. Without the active and financial support of these countless unbelievers in disguise, the churches with their hostility to free thought would lose vastly in popular influence and power for repression. Orthodoxy lives to-day by taxing heterodoxy. It cracks the whip over the heads of these conquered rebels, and makes them "hewers of wood and drawers of water." The clanking of their chains is enough to fill the soul of a true freeman with an indignation tempered only by contempt. What humiliation can be more ruinous or complete, than that of being pressed into service in the enemy's ranks—or, worse still, made to work in the trenches under fire from one's own friends? Many a crime visited with severe legal penalties has in it less intrinsic degradation than this voluntary serfdom to a secretly despised authority.

3. The hypocrisy of this decking oneself before the public with the borrowed plumes of orthodoxy reacts upon character in a way unsuspected, perhaps, yet most disastrously real. He who walks the streets of a city with an artist's eye sees few men and few women whom he can adjudge beautiful in any other than the most conventional sense. Nor is it easier for him who scans the crowds that throng Vanity Fair to discover characters that he is able to admire as nobly and greatly human. The interior and most rare dignity of soul which entitles one to the high praise of moral grandeur has no enemy deadlier than untruthfulness to secret convictions—the especial vice of him who shuns the costly conspicuousness of singularity in religion. The deformity thus engendered is not to be remedied by false calves or teeth or hair, or any other device of physiological upholstery; it is written on every feature of the face, and read by every one who knows the natural language of sincerity and courage. The conformist signs the death-warrant of his own manliness; and though he be wealthy as Croesus, he cannot buy for his victim the luxury of a private funeral. All the world know of the decease, and attend the obsequies. The true man is always known. So is the dummy, whose religion, like his coat, is cut out by the fashion-plate.

"But I must go to church with my orthodox wife—I must bring up my children under the best influences—I must sustain a religion which is needed by the masses—I must set a good example to the community"—and so on to the end of the chapter. Yes—we know all that. We know that you propose to set a good example to the community by sustaining a religion you do not believe in, and to bring up your children under the best influences by having them taught what you know to be false and mischievous. Yes, we profoundly admire your consistency and your self-sacrifice, and think an orthodox heaven ought to be specially constructed for you as a reward for your tenderness towards your wife's orthodoxy. We are struck with awe at the heroism which unflinchingly faces the persecution of an increased patronage in business, an assured social position, and a general halo of respectability which gives you dignity and influence with your fellow-citizens. And in consideration of all these sacrifices, it would be utterly unreasonable to ask you to give any money or take any trouble for the principles you believe in, or in any way to imperil the necessity of continuing to make sacrifices so disinterested. With an apology, therefore, for having intruded upon your valuable leisure, we respectfully take our leave, and retire to the companionship of those who are so fanatical as to avow what they believe, thinking that the best example they can set is to be themselves as uncompromisingly true to conviction as the community ought to be.

Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, N. Y., would like to make a few engagements to lecture, about the first of February, in places on or near the railroad between that place and Chicago. Will not our energetic Radicals seize this opportunity to secure a treat for themselves and friends, in listening to one of the most thoughtful writers and bravest yet sweetest spirits in the liberal ranks? A lecture of his on "The New Spirit of the Age," lately delivered in Syracuse, is spoken of by his fellow-townsmen in such terms as to disprove the universal truth of the old proverb about "a prophet in his own country." While negro minstrels et id genus omne draw crowded houses everywhere, it is no credit to America that the demand for fine thought clothed in fitting garb is so slight; and patriotism alone would prompt us to wish a large hearing for men who, like Mr. Mills, are qualified to educate the taste and intellect of our countrymen.

AN URGENT APPEAL TO MR. ABBOT.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I have read THE INDEX faithfully, and am convinced that I have no right to call myself a Christian, since I cannot do so in the original and historical meaning of that term, which means one who calls Jesus "the Christ" in the New Testament sense. I am sorry to have to give up the Christian name, for it is very dear to me, as representing not only nineteen centuries of progress, but the highest morality, wisdom, culture, philanthropy, and worship of the nineteenth. Still I consoled myself by remembering that all this might be called American as truly as Christian, and was good under either name, until it occurred to me that, by this rule of going back to original and historical significations, I had no right to call myself an American either. This continent was originally called America on the supposition that it was discovered by Amerigo Vespucci. But the fact is that he did not discover America, but only stole the credit of having done so from Christopher Columbus. Every time we use the term American, we become accomplices in this shameful fraud, and assist Amerigo Vespucci to usurp Columbus' laurels. Whenever I call myself an American, I endorse one of the basest of swindlers. I shall do so no longer. I am not an American. But what am I? Dear Mr. Abbot, please tell me quickly what I can logically and historically call myself! I don't claim to be a Columbiad. At least I wouldn't be a bore.

A NAMELESS ADHERENT.

[Our friend's case is a hard one. We would suggest that he get the Legislature to name him after the Mr. "Anonymous" whom we admired so much in our childhood, as the writer of even more hymns than Dr. Watts or Dr. Doddridge.

Seriously, if the word Christian had in common use no more reference to Jesus than American has to Vespucci, we should accept it as cheerfully as we do our private inherited name, which etymologically would commit us to Romish ecclesiasticism. We reject it, however, because it still stands to the public for a system of faith which we cannot accept, and because we are unwilling to wear a mask. Nor are we anxious to find a substitute for it. At any rate, we do not propose, like Adam, to name all the animals of the earth.—ED.]

THE YOUNG SOLDIERS OF THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, Dec. 3, 1870.

I send you a copy of the programme of the exercises in Music Hall last evening commemorative of the former members of the Latin School who fell in the late war, and I shall send you a copy of the Daily Advertiser of today containing Mr. Everts's address, which is well worth reading. The statue in the upper room of the Latin School is, I think, very beautiful and appropriate. It is that of a beautiful woman, representing the Alma Mater of the School sitting in antique drapery and partially clasping one corner of a shield, a little further back than her left knee, with her left hand. The top of the shield extends a little higher than the knee, and along her limb almost as far back as her person. On the shield, resting on the same plane as her feet, are inscribed in gilt letters in intaglio, in two parallel columns, the names of the fifty-one who gave their lives for their country. One of the names is that of ——. The right hand is gracefully uplifted a little higher than her head, and holds a wreath—I suppose, to represent one of laurel. The face has a sweet, mournful expression, and is exquisitely beautiful. The whole is in a sort of niche built out from the wall on the right of the teacher's table. On the same wall, a little outside of the niche, are two larger marble slabs, on which are cut in blackened letters the names of the rest of the two hundred and eighty-seven former Latin School pupils who returned safe from the war. The words—"ALMA MATER FILIOS GRATATUR REDUCES"—are inscribed, three on the top of one slab and two on the top of the other. J. H. A.

SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—If spontaneity may be assumed to account for all other phenomena, and primitively for the creation of forms, why may it not account, among the rest, for the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus? Surely if organisms out of unorganized matter may be so accounted for, it would be no less reasonable to assume that matter in the form of the Scripture Virgin, acting by spontaneity, produced the marvellous result recorded! If not, why not? Will "the younger and more scientific" answer?

If Prof. Huxley is correctly reported, he has said that,—“If he could look back to the first commencement of life on earth, he should expect to witness the evolution of living protoplasm out of not living [dead, inert?] matter.” Now it seems to me that life does not and cannot exist without motion—that matter, prior to the period of formation, must, therefore, have had life, as motion must certainly have been developed before and continued during the process of the evolution of forms, living or dead. Why cannot the Professor go a little back of the evolution or creation of living forms, and give a reasonable view of the status of matter prior to its quickening, and explain by what efficient cause that event was effected? For here must be found, if at all, the basis for all true ideas upon the subject; and if this cannot certainly be known, unreliable theories may be indefinitely multiplied—cui bono?

The more I ponder this subject, the more clearly I perceive that it is not one whit more illogical to assume that matter was made out of nothing, than that INTELLIGENCE results from the organization of matter that did not previously involve at least its principle. I know of no exception to the law that like begets like; therefore intelligence must have had a like progenitor.

“That which is born of the Spirit is Spirit, and that which is born of the flesh is flesh” (matter), is certainly an intelligent and intelligible statement of the eternally prevailing law.

I can readily believe in any material effects produced by the combination of material substances or things; but I cannot recognize as logical the spiritual or non-material result claimed, by any combination or organization of matter whatever, except as before explained.

Truly yours,

K. N.

[The alternatives of “spontaneous generation,” an unfortunately chosen term to express the natural and gradual evolution of the lowest organic forms out of inorganic matter, and of “miraculous creation,” or the sudden appearance of the highest organic forms otherwise than by parentage, are equally, in our opinion, compatible with belief in a universal, formative Intelligence. The question is purely one of method, and turns on the credibility of miracle. Creation by law or by miracle—that is the problem, if problem it can be called. In either case, the appearance of organic forms is to our mind incomprehensible except as the result of Intelligence. Yet if the “art of concealing art” is the characteristic of the greatest artistic genius, the slow development of living forms of great complexity out of unorganized matter is the proof of a far higher Intelligence than the clumsy and mechanical creation of them by mere modelling out of clay. The God of the Hebrews was a Frankenstein-sculptor. But to modern thought God is the infinite Energy that by undeviating and slowly working law creates cosmos out of chaos. The intelligibility of the effect is the best proof of the intelligence of the cause.—ED.]

A RADICAL OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., Dec. 18, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—Did you ever come across that quaint old book by Ethan Allen, the hero of Ticonderoga, entitled—“Reason the Only Oracle of Man?” I was pleased not long since to find a copy of it at the house of a friend, and was not a little surprised to find that the old hero was no less powerful as a writer than as a warrior; and I have taken the trouble to translate a couple of passages from his book for the benefit of the readers of THE INDEX.

D. B. S.

“Abstract the idea of goodness from the character of God, and it would cancel all our obligation to him, and excite us to hate and detest him as a tyrant. Hence it is that ignorant people are superstitiously misled into a conceit that they hate God, when at the same time it is only the idol of their own imagination, which they truly ought to hate and be ashamed of. But were such persons to connect the ideas of power, wisdom, goodness and all possible perfection in the character of God, their hatred toward him would be turned into love and adoration. For mankind to hate truth as it may bring their evil deeds to light and punishment, is very easy and common; but to hate truth as truth, or God as God, which is the same as to hate goodness for its own sake, unconnected with any other consequences, is impossible even to a (premised) diabolical nature itself.”

“The benefit accruing to us from reasoning and argument, as it respects our knowledge and practice, is to explore the truth of things, as they are in their own nature. This is our wisdom. All other conceptions of things are false and imaginary. We cannot exercise a thought on anything whatever that has a positive existence, but, if we trace it thoroughly, it will centre in an independent cause, and be evidential of a God. Thus it is from the works of nature that we explore its great Author; but all inquisitive minds are lost in their searches and researches into the immensity of the divine fulness, from whence our beings and all our blessings flow.”

ABOLISH THE CHURCH.

Writers upon the comparative value of religious institutions, past and present,—upon their success as agents in the world's reformation, and upon the probable result which would follow any change that might wipe these “regenerators” out,—make, it seems to me, a very great error in their estimates of value, and give these “authorities” in the moral world more than they deserve. In the writings and speeches of many of our best men and women there is an inclination to throw this bone of comfort to this Cerberus, “orthodoxy,” by telling how much good has been done in the past, and even in the present, by “the church.” Now justice is every man's and every institution's best friend, no matter what the result may be of its weighing. Though it demolish them by a blow, and bury them out of sight forever, it is always best for all concerned. In furthering the ends of justice, it is wrong to credit any man or body of men with qualities which do not wholly and originally belong to him or it, as a natural outgrowth. And I assert that this organized power called “the church,” no matter where, or when, or under what name, is bad,—all bad from head to foot, without one redeeming virtue to commend it to human sympathy or respect, or save it from the “retributions of events.” I believe (and it is capable of the fullest proof) that this creed-producer, with its dogmas, its rituals, its temples and crosses, its pulpits and priests, its racks and excommunications, its missions and tract societies, its whole ecclesiastical machinery, its very existence under the sun, its every element, every characteristic by which it may be known and recognized from the world outside it, is evil, and utterly evil; powerless for good in intent or act, though infinite almost in capacity for mischief. It has built itself upon the ruins of human nature in all time,—a ruin wrought by the wicked assumption of the total depravity of that nature; and its utmost endeavor has been to make its doctrine a terrible reality.

Men and women in all ages and of all races known to history, from then till now, have done noble deeds, have earned immortal fame for virtue and for devotion to principle. Every God-like quality possible to us has found full expression in the lives of men and women, somewhere in the world's history. Human nature, so long decried and spit upon by these religions, has been, and eternally will be, asserting its nobleness, its beauty, and perfection. Sometimes these gracious attributes have shone through monkish cowl and cloak, in company with the vices of intolerance and persecution,—Alpine flowers of charity growing amidst the pitiless snows of religion; sometimes in the martyr-spirit, which bore all pain and sorrow rather than disobey its convictions of duty, and sometimes outside the pale of religious belief, from souls which know no hereafter, and have no religion, as the world understands it. The good deeds of history are the outcrop of man's humanity, hereditary to the race. No institution can fairly rob him of his rights, or lessen or add to his obligations. Not one human virtue was ever the result of mere religious teaching. Rather these good deeds have been done in the teeth of the prevailing belief.

If I speak harshly of these assumptions, it is because the time demands it. Churches and established religions of all shades have had, and can have, but one object, and that is self-preservation, and propaganda as a means to that end. The good found there is the private property of the individual men and women who brought it there; the evil is the natural offspring of the "institution." The only hope of the future is in its utter and total destruction.

NO CONFLICT.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, Sept. 19, 1870.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Your discourse published in No. 33 of THE INDEX is so exactly in harmony with my feelings that I wish to respond, though I do it briefly. I am one of many who regard the fact of spirit intercourse as demonstrated. Having had evidence that compelled the acceptance of this much, I can hardly think it possible for any one to go so far, and no farther. Every point as set forth in your discourse as the work and aim of Free Religion is also insisted upon, as I understand it, in the teachings and philosophy of modern Spiritualism. Of small value would be the knowledge of this fact, if it did not raise us into a purer atmosphere than the inculcations of any of the creeds of past or present. That which strengthens and stimulates our spiritual faculties, so that they require an ascendancy over the animal, will surely bring the much desired character that Free Religion is striving to increase in the souls of all mankind.

That many Spiritualists have not yet outgrown the dogmatism of sectarian forms, out of which so many have but recently come, is not to be wondered at. I believe the influence of spiritual beings, grown larger in spiritual life than they were able to attain in their earth experience, has set in motion, as one of their means of progress this Free Religious movement. The tendency of all past theological standards has not been to unfold the spiritual nature. Bigotry has no place in a spiritually unfolded soul. The truth will make us free. The truth did not lead the ancients to fear and tremble when the sun or moon was hid by an eclipse. The lack of spiritual development may have necessitated the religious teachings of the past, whose power was only to influence the fears of the people. Spiritualism brings a religion founded on Nature and Reason, in which love takes the place of fear. Spirit-intercourse has a tendency to unfold these higher attributes of our nature, as well for present as for future use. The fact of immortality is what gives it its pre-eminent value, for the three score years with earth's conditions alone would scarce be worth while.

I can hardly understand the zeal exhibited by so many to ignore the evidence of immortality and establish the opposite. How few are the wrongs that are righted in this life, so far as mankind's relations to each other are concerned! I admit the one-sided immortality of the Advent faith; and the revengeful spirit of Orthodox immortality is worse than none; but I have no quarrel with either. The true way is doubtless the best. We must "learn to labor and to wait" for the truth to make us free.

Yours truly,

P. THOMPSON.

ANATHEMAS CATHOLIC AND ANATHEMAS PROTESTANT.

[We give below the Anathema Maranatha, or great curse of the Roman Church pronounced against Victor Emanuel, and the little curse of a Protestant prayer-meeting pronounced against Theodore Parker. The latter is from the Boston correspondence of the National Standard, giving an account of the Boston Daily Prayer-meeting on Thanksgiving Day. We put the two together to show how Protestantism, in cursing as in all other things, imitates Catholicism, and thus acts out in broad daylight the farce of the frog and the ox so familiar to all readers of Æsop.—Ed.]

By authority of the Almighty God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and of the holy canons; and of the undefiled Virgin Mary, mother and nurse of our Savior; and of the celestial virtues, angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, powers, cherubim, and seraphim; and of all the holy patriarchs and prophets; and of all the apostles and evangelists; and of the holy innocents (who, in the sight of the holy Lamb, are found worthy to sing the new song); and of the holy martyrs and holy confessors; and of the holy virgins; and of all the saints, together with all the holy and elect of God—we excommunicate and anathematize him, and from the threshold of the holy Church of God Almighty we sequester him, that he may be tormented in eternal excruciating sufferings, together with Dathan and Abiram and those who say to the Lord God,—“Depart from us; we desire none of Thy ways.” And as fire is quenched with water, so let the light of him be put out forevermore.

May the Father who created man curse him. May the Son who suffered for us curse him. May the Holy Ghost which was given to us in our baptism curse him. May the Holy Cross which Christ (for our salvation triumphing over his enemies) ascended, curse him. May the Holy and Eternal Virgin Mary, Mother of God, curse him. May St. Michael, the advocate of holy souls, curse him. May all the angels and archangels, principalities and powers, and all the heavenly armies, curse him. May St. John the precursor, and St. John the Baptist, and St. Peter, and St. Paul, and St. Andrew, and all other Christ's apostles together, curse him. And may the rest of his disciples and the four Evangelists (who by their preaching converted the universal world, and may the holy and wonderful company of martyrs and confessors (who by their holy works are found pleading to God Almighty), curse him.

May the Choir of the Holy Virgins (who for the honor of Christ have despised the things of the world) damn him; may all the saints (who from the beginning of the world and everlasting ages are found to be beloved of God) damn him; may the heavens and the earth, and all the holy things remaining therein, damn him.

May he be damned wherever he be, whether in the house or in the field, whether in the highway or the byway, whether in the wood or the water, or whether in the church. May he be cursed in living and in dying, in eating and drinking, in fasting and thirsting, in slumbering and sleeping, in watching or walking, in standing or sitting, in lying down or walking, mingendo, cacando, and in blood-letting.

May he be cursed in all the faculties of his body. May he be cursed inwardly and outwardly. May he be cursed in his hair. May he be cursed in his brains. May he be cursed in the crown of his head and in his temples. In his forehead and in his ears. In his eyebrows and in his cheeks. In his jawbones and in his nostrils. In his foreteeth and in his grinders. In his lips and in his throat. In his shoulders and in his wrists. In his arms, his hands, and in his fingers.

May he be damned in his mouth, in his breast, in his heart, and in all the viscera of his body; may he be damned in his veins and in his groin, in his thighs and genital organs, in his hips and in his knees, in his legs, feet, and toenails!

May he be cursed in all the joints and articulations of his members. From the top of his head to the sole of his foot may there be no soundness in him.

May the Son of the living God, with all the glory of his majesty, curse him; and may Heaven, with all the powers that move therein, rise up against him, curse and damn him!

Amen. So be it. Amen.

An aged brother, near the close of the meeting, was particularly desired to present some of the facts of his experience; and the one he chose was a narrative of the proceedings (in which he had taken part) of that famous meeting where “more than forty of them”—just the number who formerly banded themselves together against Paul—held a meeting for the express and single purpose of praying against Theodore Parker. This venerable conspirator stated that he and the others had joined in continuous praying for about the space of an hour—one following another, without rising from their knees—and that the burden of each prayer was that God would either convert Theodore Parker, “if he could,” or else—some said—“remove him; some, “silence him;” some, “take him away!” They all agreed not only in requesting, but vehemently urging this “taking off,” as Macbeth called it, leaving the means to the disposal of the hearer of the prayer; but insisting—and some of them, said the venerable conspirator, even “seeming to demand”—that the work be done. And, he solemnly added, not many months after this, Theodore Parker's health failed, and two years after he was dead.

The feeling of the meeting seemed to agree with the obvious feeling of the speaker that this was a case of “answer to prayer,” and a matter especially appropriate for rehearsal on Thanksgiving Day. The venerable conspirator, however, omitted to state what we know from the testimony of another person providentially present at that curse-meeting, though not sympathizing with it—namely, that the desired arrest of Mr. Parker's voice or life might take place on the Sunday next to follow, before he could again address his vast congregation in the Music Hall; and the reason offered by one or more of them for asking Divine interposition,—“Thou knowest, O Lord, that we cannot answer him!”

I could not but reflect what the forty imprecators would have thought of it if, while Thomas Sims was locked up in our court-house, and Deacon Safford was preventing even prayer for his deliverance, two-score of Abolitionists had been foolish and wicked enough to pray in concert for a sudden taking-off of the said deacon; and if—when the deacon, years after, had died a natural death—they who thus prayed had devoutly referred to this fact as an answer to prayer, what would have been thought of such an inference from such premises?

Hon. Israel S. Diehl, late U. S. consul at Java, has been lecturing in Pittsburgh on “Bible Lands,” Babylon and Nineveh, etc. Many things among the people of those countries, he said, we might well imitate. In all the millions of these Asiatic people, drunkenness and rum-shops are unknown. The same is true of swearing. If a man swears, the first duty of any man that hears him is to knock him down. Imagine what would happen if such were the practice in this country! When they want to say anything bad of a man, they say “he is as dirty as a Christian.”—N. Y. Independent.

The Woman Question:—“Can you let me have $20 this morning?”

The Man Question:—“What did you do with that $1 I gave you last week?”

SUNDAY SECULAR LECTURES.

[Can any liberal person read such a diatribe as this, especially the lines we have italicised, without perceiving the aggressive and tyrannical character of orthodox superstition? Orthodoxy persecutes to the limit of its ability and courage; and we have the wisdom of our secularized American system to thank that this limit is so narrow. Let the insight thus unguardedly permitted into the spirit and aims of the Y. M. C. A. prevent all lovers of liberty and progress from contributing one cent to the support of such an institution.—Ed.]

[From Zion's Herald.]

The Chairman of the Old Bay State Course of Lectures has undertaken, in defiance of the evangelical element of Boston, to which he is mainly indebted for his success as a Manager, to inaugurate a series of strictly secular lectures on the evening of every Sunday, at the Boston Theatre. When Mr. Thomas Hughes was in Boston, he said to his friends that, if he had known the theological bias of the Fraternity, he would have refused to lecture in their course. “They may be good fellows,” he said; “I do not doubt that; but their theology is not mine, and if I had known its bias, I would not have spoken in the course.” Large numbers of the patrons of the Old Bay State Course have supported it for the same reason. They did not choose to encourage the “Fraternity,” knowing that whatever profits were made on it would be practically an appropriation from them to the upholding of a non-evangelical church.

The first of this series of Sunday lectures was given by Gen. Kilpatrick, on the “Battles of the Rebellion,” and the second, on Sherman's “March to the Sea.” The third is the lecture on “Dickens,” by George William Curtis. The fourth is to be one of Nasby's Comic Lectures! What and who comes next, whether Josh Billings or the “Fat Contributor,” we are unable to state.

Gen. Kilpatrick not only glorifies war with all its phases of plundering, and deception, and lying, but is one of the most rollicking, spread-eagle orators in the whole country. He is a sort of George Francis Train, only with more brains, and more egotism, and more common sense. His speeches are totally unfit for delivery in a church even on week days—far less for a Sabbath evening. Curtis's lecture on Dickens is simply a literary eulogium of the great novelist. And everybody knows Nasby, and let all who have heard him, and admired him on week days, judge whether his lectures are fitted to entwine themselves with pulpit or sacramental memories.

We understand that new tracts are preparing to prove that the Sabbath should be disregarded; and it was announced only two weeks ago that “another step” toward opening the Public Library on Sunday had been gained. Let the public get accustomed to lectures on all subjects on Sunday evening, and what possible reason can be urged why the Theatre should not be opened for its usual amusements? If Kilpatrick in person is permitted to tell of his exploits, why should not Othello by proxy be suffered to narrate his adventures?

This is a gauntlet of defiance thrown down to the evangelical churches of Boston. Mr. Roberts may find that in permitting himself to be used by the anti-Sabbatical “set,” he has cut himself loose from his best supporters. We do not believe that after this action, Bishop Simpson, or Mr. Punshon, or Mr. Gough will consent to appear under his auspices, unless this course is changed. Even those lecturers who speak on Sunday in Boston will, we think, be promptly repaid by not being invited to speak elsewhere. The Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States control a majority of the lyceums, and they will wage warfare against this daring innovation.

Boston, with its large papal and “free religion” populations, may be conquered by this movement; but Boston is not New England, and the evangelical power is a unit against it elsewhere and everywhere. The daily papers of Boston are strangely silent; even those that opposed the opening of the Public Library are dumb before this bolder stride. We appeal to the clergy to make their voices heard, so that even the dailies shall no longer dare to ignore it.

Managers must be taught that, if they do this thing, their evangelical patrons will withdraw from their week-day courses; and we must make lecturers feel that, if they kneel to the Baul of Boston anti-Sabbatarian opinion, the evangelical power in every other city will be brought to bear against them. Will the churches speak?

That there may be occasions for certain kinds of addresses, is possible. But these should be commenced and ended as at all other religious meetings. Punshon, Beecher, Gough might speak to religious edification. Anna Dickinson, of a Sunday night, portrayed, in the Boston theatre, the terrible state of the Mormon women. It was a missionary speech, solemn and tearful. The service was opened with prayer. Yet if this should be used as an excuse for Curtis and Kate Field discoursing on Dickens, then its repetition should never be permitted. We urge the successful manager of the Bay State to abandon what will prove an unsuccessful venture, degrading at once to morals and religion, and not increasing his own income or reputation.

A clergyman, reading a chapter of the Bible for his congregation, found himself at the bottom of the page with the words, “And the Lord gave Noah a wife,” then, turning over two pages instead of one, he continued, “and he pitched her within and without with pitch.”

Department

OF THE

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

THIS PORTION OF THE INDEX IS DEVOTED TO THE SPECIAL INTERESTS OF THE AMERICAN FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, AND IS UNDER THE EDITORIAL CHARGE OF ITS SECRETARY.

OFFICERS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

PRESIDENT—Octavius B. Frothingham, New York City.
VICE PRESIDENTS—Robert Dale Owen, New Harmony, Ind.; Rowland Connor, Boston; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Newport, R. I.
SECRETARY—Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass.
ASSISTANT SECRETARY—Miss Hannah E. Stevenson, 19 Mt. Vernon Street, Boston.
TREASURER—Richard P. Hallowell, 98 Federal Street, Boston.
DIRECTORS—Isaac M. Wise, Cincinnati, Ohio; Charles K. Whipple, Boston; Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Francis E. Abbot, Toledo, Ohio; John Weiss, Watertown Mass.; Francis Tiffany, West Newton, Mass.

LEAVE-TAKING.

With this issue of THE INDEX, this Department of the paper, specifically devoted to the interests of the Free Religious Association, is abolished. There is no reason for this except that it is thought that a more satisfactory arrangement to all concerned can now be made. The purely official and technical matter pertaining to the Association is not sufficient to fill the allotted space every week; and, though it was not intended that any very rigorous rule in this respect should be observed, yet there has been some natural embarrassment at times with regard to the insertion of other matter than that which would properly come in this class. I have endeavored to use the utmost care on this point. But I wish to say here that, whenever, aside from reporting the doings of the Association or of the Executive Committee, I have expressed in these columns opinions concerning the principles or movement which the Association represents, it has been with no thought of being understood as speaking for anybody but myself. At the same time I trust that these opinions have not been so individual that they could not be endorsed by the great body of the members of the Association. And I should be very sorry if any member has felt aggrieved by anything that has been said in this Department. I am vastly more desirous to serve the interests of mental and spiritual freedom than to push any opinions of my own. And it is because I believe that the Free Religious Association represents these interests and seeks through them to establish a purer and grander human fellowship than is possible under the auspices of any sect or within the limits of any specific religion, that I have been drawn to it and have consented to stand as one of its officers. The office itself would rebuke me, were I ever to lose sight of the fact, that on matters of opinion and belief I have no more claim to speak for the Association than has any other member.

Yet it is believed that this Department has not been by any means useless, however meagre its contents may sometimes have seemed. It has been the means of bringing the Association to the knowledge of some people who knew nothing of its existence before. It has afforded a convenient place for advertising its meetings and publications, and for correcting public misrepresentations of its objects. It has been, indeed, no small advantage to the Association to have had these two or three columns each week as an organ of communication with the public. And the Executive Committee feel very grateful to the editor and proprietors of THE INDEX for the free use of this space during the past year. The understanding being clear at the outset that neither party was to be in any way responsible for the work of the other, this understanding has been strictly observed throughout the year, and the co-operation has been uniformly harmonious and pleasant. And the Department is now abandoned, not because it might not still be an advantage to keep it, but because, looking at all sides of the question, it is believed something better may be done. What the new arrangement is the editor has announced elsewhere. It is sufficient to say here that some of the prominent officers of the Association and friends of the free religious movement, besides the editor, will have a page set apart for their exclusive use as Editorial Contributors each week;—for which, however, they will write simply in their individual capacity, and utterly independent of their official relation to the Association or to each other. They may, perhaps, sometimes write of the Association,—of its principles and proceedings,—but each, when so writing, will wish to be understood as giving simply his own view. The Free Religious Association, as such, will have no Department in THE INDEX after this number, and no responsibility for any portion of its contents.

But, though this Department is abandoned, the Association is not abandoned. That, on the contrary, is more vigorous and active than ever. Every year, every month, is disclosing more and more of the grandeur of its aim and the magnitude of its possibilities. For myself, I was never more hopeful than now. So far from looking back upon these four years as failure, I am struck with awe as I look into the future and behold the vast comprehensiveness of the movement into which this little organization of ours may open. I want to devote myself to nothing better, to nothing grander, to nothing more sacred. What is there more sacred, and that has a better promise, than this attempt to draw warring sects and nations and religions out of their hostilities and strifes into fellowship on the basis of mutual regard for each other's wants and wrongs? Friends and brothers, are we awake to the greatness of the work, to the greatness of the opportunity? The sects have had their day; the specific religions are losing their authority; the walls between nations and races are being broken down. A new era dawns. With it are coming scientific fearlessness of inquiry, impartial reverence of truth, liberty of thought and act, free commerce, a congress of nations, unity and brotherhood of race, fraternal justice and amity, universal fellowship in spirit. Fellow-members of the Free Religious Association, this is your era. The great opportunity calls for great devotion. It calls for time, for talent, for culture, for money. It demands the utmost energies of earnest men and women. No nobler cause ever asked for the fealty of your hearts and hands.

Pardon me, brothers, this earnest closing word on this closing day of a pleasant year's intercourse on this page. W. J. POTTER.

CHRISTIANS AND MOHAMMEDANS IN INDIA.

Mr. Aldrich, a Unitarian Missionary in India, thus writes to the Christian Register concerning some Mohammedan converts from Christianity whom he had visited:—

I called last Friday at a Mohammedan Mosque or Musjid, in the northern part of the city, to see some Eurasians who have recently embraced the faith of Islam. I found five such persons, two of them young men, not more than thirty years of age, and the other three forty-five or fifty, I should say. They became Mohammedans about three months ago. They were circumcised and submitted to all the ceremonies incumbent upon those who profess that religion. Four of them are married men and have families, but I did not see them. I think that they are persons of considerable intelligence.

WHY?

They told me that they had always lived in Calcutta, and had been Christians up to the time of adopting their new religion. I tried to find out their motives for joining the Mohammedans. They told me that they were very poor, and that the Mohammedans had been very kind to them, long before they joined them; while on the other hand the Christians, to whom they felt that they had a right to look for sympathy and kindness, despised and shunned them on account of their dark skins, treating them as inferiors even in the house of worship, outcasting them from all society and brotherly intercourse. With them they said they felt they were strangers, but with the Mohammedans they were at home. Equals and brothers, and much more of the same tenor, they said to me, in what seemed to me a spirit of simple-hearted earnestness. One of them said, just as I was leaving,—and it struck me with great force, because so different from the spirit of the great Founder of Christianity,—“I do not know what Christianity is like in other places, but from what I know of it here it seems to me that it is only intended for the rich and titled, those who can live in fine houses, and dress in costly garments, and especially,” he added bitterly, “men and women with white skins, and not poor dark men like me. For such as I there seems to be no place in Christian society, or in the rich and elegant houses in which Christians meet to worship God.” I could not help but feel, from what I have seen of Calcutta life, that there was too much truth in what he said. Sad it is, but true, that such things are permitted; that the pure Gospel of Jesus is so shamefully perverted, and that such unworthy acts are committed in the name of Christianity. But a just God will not permit these things to last forever. A day of settlement must come when the wronged shall be righted, the oppressed and downtrodden shall lift their heads in hope and joy, the poor and despised shall be treated as men and brothers, and, better than all, a black skin shall not deprive a man of all the rights that belong to manhood, and rule him out of all Christian fellowship and sympathy, as at present.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on “The Idea of the Free Religious Association;” DAVID A. WASSON, on “The Nature of Religion;” MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on “Religion as a Social Force;” F. E. ABBOT, on “The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;” S. JOHNSON, on “The Natural Sympathy of Religions;” RABBI WISE, on “The Universal Elements in Judaism;” COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on “Mohammedanism;” WM. H. CHANNING, on “The Religions of China;” W. J. POTTER, on “The Religions of India;” and an abstract of a discussion on the “Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States.” This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on “THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA,” (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

THE ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on “THE WORSHIP OF JESUS” (50 cents), and an essay on “REASON AND REVELATION,” by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the “Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj;” also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on “Religion and Social Science;” a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on “Religious Movements in England;” and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

An old agricultural laborer in England tried a musical method of evangelizing his family. Being remonstrated with by the pastor for not “bringing up” his boys as he should, he replied,—“I dunno ow 'tis, sir; I order 'em down to pray, night and mornin', and when they won't go down, I knocks 'em down; and yet they ain't good!”

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE is an optical wonder: reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation. A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.
